not been actually severed and divided." (1) So where the plaintiff as manager granted a lease to the defendant and the plaintiff's son subsequently sold his undivided half-share to the defendant whom the plaintiff sued for the full rent and the defendant pleaded his purchase as entitling him to deduct the moiety of the rent, the court decreed the full claim holding that the defendant could not claim to be in possession of any particular land until partition. (2)

1157. Manager's right to possession.—It being clear that no co-parcener has any right to separate possession of the co-parcenary estate, and all alike being entitled to joint possession and enjoyment, its actual possession and management must vest in the manager. He is entitled to physical possession of the entire joint estate and can consequently eject a co-parcener if he have taken exclusive possession of any portion of the joint estate. (3) So where the son had removed himself from the family dwelling house as he objected to live with his mother-in-law and taken up a separate residence in a house which used to be rented, the father was held entitled to eject him on the ground that a co-parcener was not entitled to exclusive possession of any portion of the joint property. (4) But of course the manager cannot eject any one from the joint occupation of the family-house (5) though where the co-parcener disturbs by his conduct the peace of the family he may even exclude him therefrom if necessary, by an injunction restraining the co-parcener from entering upon any portion of the property without the consent of the manager (6) who "has a recognised position of superiority with well defined rights of management and possession independent of the consent of the other members of the family." (7) The court will protect his possession even under S. 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

1158. But where a co-parcener's possession has been acquiesced in for some time by the manager, he cannot be permitted to disturb it in the mere assertion of his right to exclusive possession. Such was the case of a co-parcener's possession of a garden which he had beautified at his expense, but from which the other co-parceners wished to eject him out of spite. The court refused to assist them adding:—"To do that would be to take away from the defendant the whole advantage of that which he had been allowed so long a time to occupy, and would in fact, have the effect of constituting the courts a source of annoyance rather than giving plaintiffs any reasonable and necessary relief." (8) The same principle guided the court in maintaining the status quo ante in a case where different co-sharers had been for a considerable time allowed to hold separate portions of the bank of a tank. (9) for his income and expenditure in the same way as if he were their agent. As previously remarked, he has in the family a position of superiority, and he is left to his own judgment to act according to what he considers best in the interest of the family. As observed by Holloway, J., "The father is not bound to account for all sums in excess of what a frugal man would have expended. The passage in the Mitakshara stating the right of the sons to prohibit excessive expenditure by no means involves the logical consequence, that, if that right of prohibition has not been or from the minority of the sons could not have been exercised, there would be after the lapse of any period how long so ever, a right of restitution. It may be said that the case of a minor requires a different consideration; the law counter-balances his disabilities with many privileges, and it may well be that he might be entitled to restitution although a son of full age would not be. It may also be that the absence of the power of interposition would be a loss attendant upon his disability from which no law could relieve him." (1) Where the discretion of the managing member is exercised bona fide and for the benefit of the estate and the family has the benefit, such discretion should not be narrowly scrutinized. (2) He cannot be held liable for his negligence. (3) He manages the joint estate for the benefit of the family and so long as he does this, he is not under the same obligation to economize or to save as would be the case with a paid agent or trustee:—"It is now well settled that when accounts have to be taken with a view to a partition of joint family properties, the account which has to be taken of the entire family property in the hands of the different members is mainly an enquiry into the existing assets. The head of the family cannot in general be called upon to defend the propriety of the past transactions of the family." (4) This view is supported by the fact that, apart from fraud or misappropriation by the manager, unless something is shown to the contrary, every adult member of an undivided family living in commensality with the manager must be taken to be a participator in and authorizer of all that has been done in the management of the property. (5) This is now agreed to by all the courts except that in a full bench case of the Calcutta High Court decided in 1870 the contrary has been laid down. (6) But this case was recently referred to as by no means striking a discordant note. (7) At all events, its contrary view is now sufficiently overruled by the Privy Council. (8)

1159. The manager of a co-parcenary is not accountable to the co-parcener

1160. But of course, the manager cannot escape his liability for fraud or gross negligence, nor can he saddle its effect upon his coparceners, unless they have profited by his wrong. (9) This was emphasized by Phear, J. in the Full Bench case, last referred to, in the following words:—"The principle that I understand the English courts of equity to act upon in these matters is simply this, that a person who has the control of and management of another's property upon the footing of anything which amounts to a confidence or trust reposed in him by this other shall not be allowed to abuse that confidence and to make a profit out of the management without the owner's consent, and inasmuch as the question whether or not a profit has been made of what has been done, is under the circumstances, solely within the knowledge of the manager himself, the court of equity will make him disclose what he has done, in other words, will make him account for his administration of the property." (1) The manager's accountability for fraud or misappropriation is reserved even in cases in which he is held to be generally unaccountable. (2) But even in such a case no co-parcener can sue for account of a portion of joint property or for one or two items. Where he has the right to call for accounts, he must do so of the whole joint property. (3)

1161. Again, it is no exception to the general rule that the manager has to account where he has agreed to. Such was the case of the defendant who managed the family banking business in Calcutta where the other co-parceners used to come to examine his accounts which were maintained on the basis of partnership. Markby, J., held that though in an undivided family the manager was not liable to account, there is nothing in law to prevent the parties from modifying the manager's immunity by an agreement, and in the case under reference, the learned Judge held that the banking business was being carried on more in the nature of a partnership than a joint business in the strict sense of the term, upon the understanding that the profits when realized, should be divided amongst the individual members in certain proportions. The defendant consequently rendered himself liable to account which was ordered. (4)

1162. The manager is, of course, liable to account for all assets of the joint family existing at the time of partition. (5) For this purpose the co-parceners are not bound to accept the manager's ipse dixit as to the extent and value of the property. That would be no account at all. He must show what has become of the family property, and if any is alienated, for what purpose and to whom it has been sold, and in fact he must not only state what the family property is but explain what has become of the rest. So where the manager admitted the existence of certain estate family jewels which were worn by members of the family on special festive occasions, he was held primarily responsible and accountable for them and could not charge the other co-parcener with possession of them. (6)

1163. The manager possesses the power to borrow money for a family purpose in his capacity as manager so as to bind the other members to the extent of their interest in the joint property. (7) But there is no presumption that any loan contracted by a manager in his own name is or has been contracted on behalf of the family (8) or is within his authority (9) or that it is for a family purpose. (10) It is, therefore, on the plaintiff who seeks to bind the other member of the joint family to prove that it is a debt contracted for their benefit, or with their consent or that there was an urgent family necessity therefor. (11) It has been held that all the members may be sued on a promissory note executed by the manager for a family necessity, (1) but apart from the liability of a trading firm for such a note drawn in its name, (2) there does not seem to be any reason why the liability of the co-parceners should be enlarged by reason of the nature of the security offered. (3) Of course, in any case, the joint family cannot be held liable on a promissory note executed by the manager for the business of a toddy shop carried on by him as an agent for a third party from whom he received a monthly salary. (4) Where the manager contracts a debt it is open to the creditor to hold him personally liable (5) or to sue him in his representative capacity (6) or to sue the whole family as liable to him. (7) Where he elects to sue the manager personally as liable on a contract, he will obtain only a personal decree in execution of which he is not entitled to bring to sale the right, title and interest of any member except his own judgment-debtor's. If, however, he elects to sue him in his representative character and has obtained a decree in that capacity, he would be entitled to sell the right, title and interest of all or any of the members of the joint family at his discretion.

1164. Lastly, the creditor may implead all members as jointly liable, in which case a decree might be passed so as to bind them all, should the debt be held recoverable from their estate. The creditor can only choose the first alternative where he has no proof of legal necessity, for in a suit based on the manager's contract, the question of legal necessity would be immaterial and would not affect his liability. It is only when he adopts the second or the third course that he has to adduce proof of the legal necessity or bona fide enquiry. In this respect there is no difference between the Mitakshara and the Dayabhag schools. (8)

1165. There remains the question whether the other co-parcener's liability can be enlarged by their subsequent acquiescence. That this is possible has been observed in several cases. (9) The acquiescence of the co-parcener is evidence of necessity. (10)

1166. Where, however, it has to be otherwise proved, it does not appear to be either necessary or in many cases possible that the creditor should prove the necessity of each item in a long series of borrowings. "If it were, it would be impossible for a Hindu Saokar keeping a running account with the manager of a family to succeed in proving his account against the family.

It will, we apprehend, be sufficient for the creditor to show that the family was in chronic need of money for the current outgoings of the family life or its trade necessities, and that the moneys were advanced on the representation of the manager that they were needed for such objects. And if the fair inference to be drawn from all the circumstances of the case leaves no doubt in the mind of the court that the moneys were borrowed for family reasons the plaintiff is entitled to succeed, although he is not able to indicate the particular purpose for which each sum has been borrowed." (1)

1167. Where the members are liable, their liability would be unlimited and not necessarily limited to their interest in the joint family. This is the necessary consequence of the rule that the manager may acknowledge the liability of the family for the debts which he has properly contracted. (2) The contrary has been held since the utmost capacity of the manager is to sell the joint estate and he could not by his act bind the co-parceners indirectly so as to involve property which he could not have sold directly under any circumstances. (3)

1168. Not only is the manager entitled to contract debts, but he is equally entitled to alienate the joint property for family necessity without the consent of the other co-parceners. Whether the manager be the father or some other co-parcener his alienation is subject to the following principles:—

- Alienation for family necessity.
- (a) The power must be exercised only in case of need.
  - (b) The matters to be considered are :
    - (i) the existence of the pressure,
    - (ii) the means of averting it, and
    - (iii) the benefit to be conferred.
  - (c) If the lender or purchaser be a party to the mismanagement, he cannot take advantage of his own wrong.
  - (d) The lender or purchaser, however, unless he acts mala fide is not affected, though better management might have preserved the estate from debt.
  - (e) If there is no necessity, the lender or purchaser must have enquired, but
  - (f) If he does enquire and acts honestly, the real existence of necessity is not a condition precedent to the validity of the transaction, provided the necessity alleged is sufficient and reasonably credited.
  - (g) The lender or purchaser is not bound to see to the application of the money advanced. (4)

1169. These rules are deducible from the leading case of Hanuman Pershad Pandey's (5) in which the Privy Council have laid down the powers and the limits of the manager's authority to alienate or charge a co-parcenary estate.

These principles have since been enacted as a part of the more general statute which protects a bona fide transferee for value who takes a transfer from the manager after reasonable enquiry into its necessity. (1)

1170. The question whether the manager has the right to transfer the joint estate or any portion of it in a case of necessity on his own authority without consulting his co-parceners has been answered in unequivocal terms by the Mitakshara which states both the rule, and an exception—the rule being that no man should make a sale or gift of anything without consulting all the sons, (2) and the exception being that he may sell or gift it in a season of distress, for the sake of the family and especially for pious purposes. (3) In the early cases however, the courts enforced the rule against the manager's power to alienate the family property without the consent of the co-parceners. Even the Privy Council were not quite sure what was the correct rule on the subject; for in Suraj Bansi's case (decided in 1881) they said:—"The right of co-parceners to impeach an alienation made by one member of the family without their authority, express or implied, has of late been frequently before the Courts of India, and it cannot be said that there has been complete uniformity of decisions respecting it. All are agreed that the alienation of any portion of the joint estate, without such express or implied authority may be impeached by the co-parceners, and that such authority will be implied at least in the case of minors, if it can be shown that the alienation was made by the managing member of the family for legitimate family purposes. It is not so clearly settled whether, in order to bind adult co-parceners, their express consent is not required; but this is a question which does not arise in the present case." (4) The Indian Courts were equally uncertain as to what was the rule and cases could be found to support any view since there were cases in which the express consent of the co-parceners was held essential, (5) and those in which it was opined that such consent might be either express or implied, (6) while there were others in which though the necessity of any consent was not insisted on, still the courts were careful to add that no hard and fast rule could be laid down, but that in such cases the conclusion as to the consent of the adult member must depend upon their own special circumstances. (7) Lastly, there were cases in which the manager's power of alienation without the consent of the co-parceners was affirmed. (8) This view now accords with the later decisions of the Privy Council who referring to the powers of a manager, observe: "The general principle in regard to that matter is that he is at liberty to affect or dispose of the joint property in respect of purposes denominated necessary purposes. The principle in regard to this is analogous to that of the power vested in the head of a religious endowment or muth, or of the guardian of an infant family. In all the cases where it can be established that the estate itself that is under administration demanded, or the family interests justified, the expenditure, then those entitled to the estate are bound by the transaction. It is not accurate to describe this as either inconsistent with or an exception to the fundamental rule of the Mitakshara. For where estate or family necessity exists, that necessity rests upon the co-parceners as a whole, and it is proper to imply the consent of all of them to that act of the one which such necessity has demanded." (1)

1171. In a later case their Lordships explained that an alienation by the manager may be equally supported by a benefit to the estate,<sup>(2)</sup> while as regards the transferee they laid down the principle which accords with the general law as enacted in S. 38 of the Transfer of Property Act. It is true that that section does not directly affect any rule of Hindu Law to the contrary ; but the tendency of recent cases is to regard the manager as entitled to transfer the joint estate, either with the consent of the co-parceners, or without their consent for legal necessity or benefit of the family. And this appears to be the rule in consonance with the text and spirit of Hindu Law.

1172. The right of the manager to enter into contracts on behalf of the co-parcenary is also settled by the Privy Council who said: "The Indian decisions as to the powers of the managing members of an Indian joint family are somewhat conflicting. It is, however, clear that where a business like money lending has to be carried on in the interest of the family as a whole, the managing members may properly be entrusted with the power of making contracts, giving receipts and compromising or discharging claims ordinarily incidental to the business. Without a general power of that sort it would be impossible for the business to be carried on at all." (3) This power is not affected by the fact that the other co-parceners are minors,<sup>(4)</sup> and in such cases the test to be applied is rather the apparent authority of the manager than the actual necessity of the family.<sup>(5)</sup>

1173. The power to make contracts necessarily implies the power to discharge it, and the Privy Council have in the case last cited ruled that he has the power to pass receipts as a necessary incident of management.

1174. Such are also the powers to compromise claims or refer them to arbitration. (6) So where a person sued the joint family for a share therein, and the father as manager compromised his suit by giving him a share, the court held that in the absence of collusion or fraud, the compromise bound the joint family, (7) and this case was followed in another case in which it was held that it was competent to the father in his capacity of manager to refer to arbitration the partition of the joint family property and the award made on such a reference, would, if in other respects valid, be binding on the sons. (8) The same rule applies equally to a manager other than the father ; and it is immaterial that some of the members were minors, provided the reference was to their benefit. (1) But, of course, where a reference is made to arbitration during the pendency of the suit to which any party is a minor, then the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code relating to minors must be adhered to. Consequently, where a suit is compromised and the court has not expressly sanctioned it as required by O. 32, R. 9 of the Code of Civil Procedure, no decree passed thereon is of any force against the minor who may avoid it, (2) though it is binding upon other parties.

1175. A compromise otherwise good, cannot be impugned by a party on the ground that he had made it under a misapprehension as to his rights<sup>(3)</sup> since it is of the essence of a compromise that the dispute is settled without examining its merits. (4)

1176. The manager may settle a dispute by the special oath of his adversary administered under the provisions of the Oaths Act. (5)

1177. The power of the manager to contract debts carries with it the necessary power to acknowledge them. As such, it has been held that the manager is an agent for the purpose of S. 19 of the Limitation Act, and may as such acknowledge debts on behalf of the joint family whether consisting of adult or minor members; (6) and any payment by a manager would be a payment by an agent duly authorized within the meaning of S. 20 of the Limitation Act. (7) But of course, the manager can only enlarge limitation in respect of debts contracted by him for the joint family. He cannot do so in respect of the debts contracted by the members individually. (8)

1178. Acknowledgment of barred debt.—Though the manager, as such, has no power to revive a debt by an agreement to repay it after it has become barred by time, such power is possessed by the father when he is the manager as against his sons, who are bound to pay their father's debts, only if they are not illegal or immoral, a liability which does not extend to any other relation beyond the point of necessity and benefit to the family. 1179. The manager has, however, no authority to acknowledge except as Manager cannot against himself, a debt already barred by time. <sup>(1)</sup> This acknowledge barred view is supported by the view that since the manager can red debts. only bind the family by his act which is necessary or beneficial to its interest and the acknowledgment of a barred debt cannot be so regarded, his acknowledgment of such a debt is beyond his power.

1180. The manager is competent to give a valid discharge within the meaning of S. 7 of the Limitation Act of a claim on behalf Manager can give of himself and his co-parceners, whether adults or minors, discharge. without the concurrence of the minor members so as to set limitation in motion against them. <sup>(2)</sup>

1181. Manager's right of suit.—That the manager may possess the right to represent the family in a suit affecting the joint family has been now conceded by the Privy Council who said: "Is there any principle of law, or any custom applicable to a case like this, according to which the managing member of a Hindu jointly family entrusted with the management of a business must be held incompetent to enforce at law the ordinary business contracts they are entitled to make or discharge in their own names. The defendant is, of course, entitled to insist on all the persons with whom he expressly contracted being made parties to the suit". <sup>(3)</sup> And in another case they said: "There seems to be no doubt upon the Indian decisions (from which their Lordships see no reason to dissent) that there are occasions, including foreclosure actions, when the managers of a joint Hindu family so effectively represent all other members of the family that the family as a whole is bound." <sup>(4)</sup>

1182. The question then arises what are these occasions. It appears to be agreed that in respect of all contracts made by the manager he has unquestionably the right to sue by himself, though the contract may have been made by him in his capacity as manager of the joint family. In such a case there is a privity of contract between him and his obligee entitling him to sue. But though this is his right, it is equally the right of the defendant to insist upon the joinder of all persons who are entitled to enforce the contract and the court should then implead them. There is no question of limitation, since the manager alone is competent to act and other members are merely joined ex majore causa.

1183. But if the defendant does not object, the decree will bind the joint family, and junior members cannot complain that they were not parties to the suit, since they were sufficiently represented by the manager. <sup>(5)</sup> But in certain courts, e.g., in Bombay, as a matter of practice the manager joins all his co-parceners in suits affecting the co-parcenary, <sup>(1)</sup> and until recently there was a conflict of opinion as to the power of the manager to maintain a suit in his own name without impleading his co-parceners, some courts holding such suits as incompetent <sup>(2)</sup> while others holding them as maintainable. <sup>(3)</sup> In some cases the courts seek to distinguish the case of the father and any other manager, holding that while the former may, the latter cannot bind the family by any decree passed against him <sup>(4)</sup> but the Privy Council have held that apart from certain textual powers possessed by the father, such distinction has no legal support. <sup>(5)</sup>

1184. Manager de facto guardian.—It has already been seen that the manager of a joint family is the de facto guardian of all minor co-parceners for the protection of whose interest no guardian can be appointed either under the Guardians and Wards Act, <sup>(6)</sup> or by the High Court in the exercise of its inherent power. <sup>(7)</sup> The only cases in which the appointment of another guardian is possible have already been considered (§ 855). In all other cases the manager of the joint family is the de facto guardian of all minors and is as such entitled to all the rights as he is subject to all the liabilities of a guardian.

Powers of other managers.

106. The provisions relating to the power of the manager of a joint family generally apply to—

(1) A manager whether subject to the Mitakshara or the Dayabhag law.

(2) The widow managing property inherited by her minor son.

(3) Guardian of a minor's estate.

(4) Manager of a religious endowment.

(5) Manager of the estate of a lunatic.

possesses the same powers as the manager of a Dayabhag family, his position approximates more closely to that of a trustee than in the case of a family governed by the Mitakshara law. (1)

1186. The manager of a lunatic is indistinguishable from the manager of a family of infant co-parceners,(2) and so is the guardian of a minor or the manager of a religious endowment. As the Privy Council observed:—‘The law of the Mitakshara has, however, given to the father in his capacity of manager and head of the family certain powers with reference to the joint family property. The general principle in regard to that matter is that he is at liberty to effect or to dispose of the joint property in respect of purposes denominated necessary purposes. The principle in regard to this is analogous to that of the power vested in the head of a religious endowment or muth or of the guardian of an infant family. In all of these cases where it can be established that the estate itself that is under administration demanded, or the family interests justified, the expenditure, then those entitled to the estate are bound by the transaction’. (3) But though the powers of the joint family manager and of other managers are analogous, they are not identical, as will be seen in the sequel where the powers of the latter are set out.

107. (1) The manager is entitled to make such gifts or presents either to the members of the family or strangers as are usual or customary.

Gift by the manager.

(2) And the father and in his absence, the mother, has in this respect even a larger discretion, being entitled to make it at any time to a reasonable extent.

1187. Analogous Law.—This section is supported by the following texts:—

Brihaspati.—Even a single individual may conclude a donation, mortgage or sale of immoveable property during a season of distress for the sake of the family and especially for pious purposes. (4)

Mitakshara.—Therefore, it is a settled point that property in the parental or ancestral estate is by birth : although the father have independent power in the disposal of effects other than immoveables for indispensable acts of duty, and for purposes prescribed by texts of law, as gifts through affection, support of the family, relief from distress, and so forth, he is subject to the control of the sons and the rest in regard to the immoveable estate whether acquired by himself or inherited from his father or other predecessor.

(3) Sahu Ram v. Bhup Singh 89 A 437 (443) P. C

(4) Brihaspati cited in Ratnakar and Mitakshara 1.1.28

"The meaning of this text is this :—While the sons and grandsons are minors and incapable of giving their consent to a gift or the like : or while brothers are so and continue unseparated, even one person who is capable may conclude a gift hypothecation or sale, of immoveable property if a calamity affecting the whole family require it or the support of the family render it necessary, or indispensable duties, such as the obsequies of the father or the like make it unavoidable". (1)

Viramitrodaya :—Gifts by the parents out of favour or affection should be guided by propriety but not by caprice. (2)

1188. The manager's power to make a gift is necessarily limited and circumscribed by the requirements of religious or customary necessity. Though he has the power to make ordinary gifts or presents on suitable occasions either to the members of the family or to strangers, this power must be confined to such occasions as are usual and to such presents as are customary. (3) For example, though a gift may be justified if made at the time of the marriage, the same gift cannot be upheld if its making is deferred for so long as to suggest that it was merely an excuse. (4) No gift can be made unless it is justified by necessity or the performance of any pious duty obligatory on the family or its co-parceners. If it is so justified, the mere fact that the members were minors would be no ground for invalidating it. (5) But, of course, the gift must be commensurate with the object and purpose of the gift and the means of the family. So where the father as head of a joint family owning property worth about ten to fifteen lakhs made a gift of Rs. 20,000 to his only daughter out of the income of the property as her marriage dowry two years after the marriage, Tyabji, J., disallowed it on the ground that it should have been made at the time of the marriage, but on appeal, it was held that as the gift was comparatively small and made out of the income, it should be upheld as a parental gift made through affection, such a gift being allowed by the texts, and this view was upheld by the Privy Council. (6)

But no co-parcener is bound to submit to a gift made for an illegal purpose, as where the father gave Rs. 8,000 to the mother of the adopted boy to induce her consent to his adoption. (7)

1189. Parents' gift.—The father, as the senior head of the family, possesses larger powers of gift than any other manager. He is entitled to make "gifts through affection" to his children, or to the son-in-law (8) and where such gifts are inconsiderable the courts uphold them even though they might consist of ancestral immoveable property. On this ground gifts of land made to the son-in-law on the occasion of the daughter's marriage, by the father (9) or the mother (10) have been upheld as in consonance with the spirit of Hindu Law. In one of these cases it was argued that the gift of land was opposed to the express texts, to which the court replied, "When the necessity of the gift is recognized, it seems unreasonable in these days to make its validity depend upon" the nature of the property, upon the question whether it is moveable or immoveable." (1) This case was followed in another case in which the court upheld the father's alienation not only upon the ground that it was reasonable but further on the ground that as the daughter was living with her father in old age taking care of him, it was an alienation supported by consideration. (2)

1190. A gift by a father of all his interest in the family property in favour of his only son, being supported by natural love and affection, may be upheld as a relinquishment which may be effective, though it may not be in favour of all co-parceners. It need not, of course, be supported by any consideration. (3) The gift of family property with the consent of the then existing co-parceners, of course, stands on an altogether different footing. So where the undivided paternal grandfather of a minor gave a portion of the family property (about 30 per cent. in value of the whole) to his third wife and daughters with the consent of his grandson's widowed mother, the court held the gift binding on the grandson, adding: "It is clear that it was open to the grandfather if he had chosen and without any one's consent, to effect a partition and leave the whole of his half share to his third wife and her daughters, and it was in our opinion clearly for the benefit of the minor and his guardian to avoid an eventuality so injurious to his interests by consenting to the alienation effected by Exhibit I." (4)

1191. Gifts to female relations on the occasion of their marriage are supported even when made by a co-parcener other than the father. Such was the case of a gift made by the brother to his sister who had been married during the life-time of the father who gave her or her husband no property at the time of marriage. The father had made no promise of any gift. It was held however, that there was a strong moral obligation on the father to make a gift out of the joint family property on the occasion of the marriage either to the daughter or son-in law as a provision for them, and the gift which in the circumstances of the case was an eminently reasonable one, was not in excess of the powers of the brother, though he was not even the managing member at the time of the marriage. (5)

1192. Though the section deals with religious and ceremonious gifts, it would not be amiss to mention that the manager may equally transfer a small portion of the joint estate for the maintenance and marriage of a female relation. So where the manager transferred land measuring 3'22 acres of land valued at Rs. 1,000 to his step sister for her maintenance and marriage and it was contended that such an alienation was beyond the capacity of the manager, the court overruled the contention holding that it was within the competence of the manager to transfer by an outright gift a small portion of the family property by way of a provision for maintenance. 1193. Quantum of gift.—Though Hindu law allows religious and charitable gifts, it also takes care to prescribe that the giver must be just to his people while he is generous to the donee.

As a matter of fact the gift the court allows, must be small and reasonable and it must not cripple the co-parcenary estate. In a Calcutta case the court upheld the gift of about a third of the father's estate by his widow to her daughter on the occasion of her gowna ceremony. (1) But this is probably an extreme limit. Ordinarily, such gifts relate to much smaller properties. So where two of the three brothers gifted their land to the plaintiff "as worshipper of the God Shri Sadguru" the court set aside the gift as invalid and unsupported by the purpose for which joint family property might be alienated. It was in effect the alienation of a co-parcenary interest without consideration which is not permissible by law. (2) The question cannot be reduced to a set formula as it must necessarily depend on the nature and extent of the corpus, the nature and extent of the gift, and whether it is made out of the corpus or only out of the current income. Where it is made out of the income, it is a strong ground for upholding it. But even where it is carved out of the corpus, the court will uphold it, if due regard being had to all the circumstances of the family, it is not unreasonable. So the court in one case upheld a grant of 3'22 acres of land valued at Rs. 1,000 out of 22 acres of the family lands and no debts (3) in the circumstances already stated. In another case the managing father had increased the family estate out of his own acquisitions valued at Rs. 17,000 and a business which yielded Rs. 2,000 annually. Finding great difficulty in getting his daughters married, he negotiated for the marriage of one of them to his sister's son and conveyed to his daughter and his sister two shops and a house worth Rs. 1,500. The court upheld the gift as inconsiderable in view of his own additions to the family estate and the necessity which prompted the gift. (4)

1194. In another case the court upheld the gift of 8 acres of ancestral land to the daughter after her marriage, out of 200 acres possessed by the family, (5) while the manager's gift of a tenth of the family lands to the daughter of a co-parcener was upheld by the same court as binding upon all the co-parceners. It was contended that the gift was unduly large and that, however justifiable when made by the father, it could not be made by any other manager but the court overruled both contentions. (6)

1195. Where gift set aside.—It must be remembered that the manager's power to make customary gifts is a curtailment of the co-parcenary rights which is only tolerated because such gifts besides being usual and customary, are inconsiderable. The manager cannot in the guise of such a gift transfer a considerable portion of the joint estate to his wife and daughters. Such a transfer would be a serious encroachment on the rights of other co-parceners and an abuse of power which may be impeached by any co-parcener. (7) Such was the gift by the two brothers of their land to the plaintiff as worshipper of the God "Shri Sad Guru" which the court set aside as the gift was invalid and unsupported by the purpose for which joint family property might be alienated. It was in effect an alienation of a co-parcenary interest without consideration which is not permissible by law. (1)

1196. Of course a gift of immoveable property must be made in writing registered in conformity with the requirements of S. 123 of the Transfer of Property Act ; otherwise, it might be set aside as invalid in law. (2)

1197. Manager's power otherwise limited.—With the exception of the father who has an almost absolute right to be the manager of his household, the right of any other relation depends in the first instance upon his seniority, but for its continuance upon the consent or acquiescence of the other co-parceners, who may supersede him or limit his powers. But the exercise of his ordinary power does not depend upon any assent or acquiescence of the co-parceners. His position is independent of the will of the co-parceners. (3) As observed by Mr. Cowell : “ When, therefore, we come to define the relation of each member, especially of the managing member, to the joint family and the joint estate, we are brought into contact with a relationship which has no counterpart in English law. Neither the term partner, nor principal, nor agent nor even a co-parcener, will strictly apply.” (4) Consequently, while the family remains joint, the powers of the manager cannot be altered by contract so as to affect the very constitution of the co-parcenary. This was the ratio decidendi of the case in which three brothers separated from their nephew, the son of their eldest brother, themselves agreeing to remain joint for twelve years after which they were to effect a partition. The eldest of them was to manage the estate and maintain an account of the profits and loss accruing up to that date which was also to be then divided with the corpus. This arrangement was adhered to for the stipulated term of twelve years after which, the youngest brother sued for a partition and profits of his share during the twelve years’ term. The manager resisted the claim for accounts pleading that he was not accountable for past profits, as the family was joint, but the Privy Council held that the agreement was not a simple agreement to postpone the partition, but had put the family upon a new footing and that his position during the term, though not that of a trustee, was that of an agent which made him accountable for his receipts and expenditure. (5) The same view was taken in another case in which by a family arrangement the head of the family, a Taluqdar, was alone to hold the estate by primogeniture, but was accountable to the junior members for their shares of the profits. The Privy Council held this kind of managership entirely unknown to Hindu Law, and observed : “ The Taluqdar here in question was in a very peculiar position ; the family were living together as a joint family and in commensality, Anant acting as head and not accounting for the profits, which is the case with an ordinary Hindu family ; but still they were living under the most distinct agreement that they were entitled not as an ordinary joint family, but in specific and definite shares. Their Lordships consider that if the enjoyment of those shares is in any way disturbed, the right to sue for profits will arise, as well as a right to partition". (1)

1198. The manager, as such, is not entitled to any remuneration for managing the estate of which he is the joint owner, though there is nothing in law to prevent him from receiving a remuneration if the co-parceners agree to pay him. (2) The co-parceners cannot limit his authority to manage the family estate by rotation (3) though the family may place another member in joint management of their estate; and where this has been the practice, the son will as of right, succeed to the joint managership on the death of his father. (4)

108. (1) The father is entitled to alienate the co-Father's additional parcenary property to satisfy his antecedent debt contracted by him for a purpose which is neither illegal nor immoral.

(2) In other respects, he possesses the same power as any other manager.

Explanation.—A debt may be imprudent or improper without being illegal or immoral.

1199. Analogous Law.—The following texts bear on the subject of this section :—

Manu:—158. The man, who becomes surety for the appearance of a debtor in this world, and produces him not, shall pay the debt out of his own property.

159. But money due by a surety, or idly promised to musicians and actresses, or lost at play, or due for spirituous liquors, or what remains unpaid of a fine or toll, the son of the surety or debtor shall not in general be obliged to pay. (6)

Brihaspati:—47. If the father is no longer alive, the debt must be paid by his sons.

48. The father's debt must be paid first of all, and after that a man's own debt; but a debt contracted by the paternal grandfather must always be paid before these two even.

49. The father's debt, on being proved, must be paid by the sons, as if it were their own; the grandfather's debt must be paid (by his son's sons) without interest, but the son of grandson need not pay it at all.

50. When a debt has been incurred for the benefit of the household by an uncle, brother, son, wife, slave, pupil or dependant, it must be paid by the head of the family. (6)

Vishnu:—He (the father) throws his debt on him (the son); and the father obtains immortality, if he sees the face of a living son.

Ib.—The father's debt must be first paid, and next a debt contracted by the man himself; but the debt of the paternal grandfather must be paid before either of them. The sons must pay the debt of their father, when proved, as if it were their own, or with interest; the son's son must pay the debt of his grandfather, but without interest; and his son shall not be compelled to discharge it. (1)

Narad:—What is left (of the father's property), when the father's obligations have been discharged, and when the father's debts have been paid, shall be divided by the brothers, in order that the father may not continue a debtor. (2)

When a devotee, or a man who maintained a sacrificial fire dies without discharging his debt, the whole merit of his devotions, of his perpetual fire, belongs to his creditors. (3)

A father must not pay the debt of his son, but a son must pay a debt contracted by his father, excepting those debts which have been contracted from love, anger, for spirituous liquor, games or bailments. (4)

Yajnavalkya:—A debt evidenced by writing is binding only on three generations. A pledge can be enjoyed as long as the debt is not returned. (5)

Ushana:—A fine or the balance of a fine, likewise a bribe or a toll or the balance of it are not to be paid by the son; neither shall he discharge improper debts. (6)

1200. The section is supported by the authority of the Privy Council, who said: "The rights of the co-parceners in an undivided Hindu family governed by the law of the Mitakshara which consists of a father and his sons, do not differ from those of the co-parceners in a like family, which consists of undivided brethren, except so far as they are affected by the peculiar obligation of paying their father's debts which the Hindu Law imposes upon sons (a question to be hereafter considered), and the fact that the father is in all cases naturally, and in the case of infant sons, necessarily, the manager of the joint family estate." (7)

1201. Then as to the sons' liability to pay the father's debts they formulated the two following propositions:—

Firstly,—that where joint ancestral property has passed out of a joint family, either under a conveyance executed by a father in consideration of an antecedent debt, or in order to raise money to pay off an antecedent debt, or under a sale in execution of a decree on the father's debt, his sons, by reason of their duty to pay their father's debts, cannot recover that property unless they show that the debts were contracted for immoral purposes, and that the purchasers had notice that they were so contracted; and

Secondly,—that the purchasers at an execution sale, being strangers to the suit, if they have not notice that the debts were so contracted, are not bound to make inquiry beyond what appears on the face of the proceedings. (8)

1202. In another case Lord Hobhouse said:—"Destructive as it may be of the principle of independent co-parcenary rights in the sons, the decisions have for some time, established the principle that the sons cannot set up their rights against their father's alienation for an antecedent debt, or against his creditor's remedies for their debts, if not tainted with immorality. On this important question of the liability of the joint estate their Lordships think that there is now no conflict of authority."<sup>(1)</sup>

Referring to this passage, Lord Shaw in a later judgment of the same Board said: "In their Lordships' opinion these expressions, which have been the subject of so much difference of legal opinion, do not give any countenance to the idea that the joint family estate can be effectively sold or charged in such manner as to bind the issue of the father, except where the sale or charge has been made in order to discharge an obligation not only antecedently incurred, but incurred wholly apart from the ownership of the joint estate or the security afforded or supposed to be available by such joint estate . . . In short, it may be said that the rule of this part of the Mitakshara law is that the joint family estate is in this position: under his management he can neither obtain money for his own purposes for it nor can he obtain money for his own purposes upon it. To permit him to do so would enable him to sacrifice those rights which he was bound to conserve. This would be equivalent to sanctioning a plain and, it might be, a deliberate breach of trust. The Mitakshara law does not warrant or legalize any such transaction."<sup>(2)</sup>

It is needless to add that this obiter dictum has taken the whole Hindu world by surprise, as it places a limitation upon the paternal powers of pledging the family estate which appear to be wholly out of keeping with his position and powers in Hindu society. This case will have, again, to be examined presently.

1203. Father's additional powers.—The liability of one person to pay the debt of another may be legal, or it may be moral or religious. In the primitive age when the divorce of law from religion had not taken place, religious obligation was indistinguishable from legal obligations, with the result that the son's obligation to pay his father's debt was absolute and independent of any assets of the father received by him by inheritance. This qualification was, however, taken as implied in determining his obligation by all the courts, <sup>(3)</sup> except in Bombay, where the obligation was literally enforced <sup>(4)</sup> till it was similarly limited by an Act passed in 1866. <sup>(5)</sup> The course of decisions in all the courts has since been uniform <sup>(6)</sup> except that in Bombay it appears to be still maintained that the creditor is entitled to obtain a decree against the son, without reference to the assets, though if the son had inherited no assets, the decree cannot be executed against him. <sup>(7)</sup> In other words, the want of assets is a good defence to recovery, but not to a decree. But if the son is only liable if he has assets, no decree seems justifiable without proof of assets.

1204. The father as manager possesses all the powers of any other manager, added to which he possesses, as father an additional power of transferring the estate for his own debt. As Chandavarkar, J. said : " Under Hindu Law a father has the right to sell or mortgage ancestral property including the interests therein of his sons, in satisfaction of his antecedent debts, provided those debts were not contracted for immoral or illegal purposes. This right to dispose of the ancestral property so as to include and affect the shares of the sons arises, according to Hindu Law, in virtue of the pious obligation of the sons to pay the debts of the father, which were not illegal or immoral. In other words, when the father alienates the property, he exercises the power of alienation which the sons would have exercised in discharge of their pious duty which they owed to him ; he is virtually alienating the property on their behalf in discharge of their duty in accordance with the power given to him by Hindu Law." (1) This is the prevailing view and has been expressed (2) or implied (3) in several cases, including those decided by the Privy Council.

1205. But in a recent case Lord Shaw has described the father's powers in terms which call for examination.

In this case the mortgagee sued the mortgagor, his sons and grandsons on foot of his mortgage and the defence of the sons and grandsons was that the mortgage was neither for legal necessity nor for an antecedent debt so as to bind their interest. As these were not proved, and as according to the Allahabad view, a co-parcenary interest cannot be conveyed without the consent of the other co-parceners, both the courts in India dismissed the suit and on an appeal being preferred to the Privy Council, these findings were upheld which concluded the suit, but nevertheless, and even though the appeal was heard ex parte, Lord Shaw stated certain principles to settle the point upon which there had been according to his Lordship "a certain conflict of decisions in the courts in India". He then referred to the Allahabad Full Bench case (4) with evident approval and recognized the distinction there made between cases of sale in which the property has passed out of the joint family and one of mortgage where the joint property is mortgaged.

1206. In the former case, that is to say, in the case where the property has already passed out of the family whether in execution of a decree or in pursuance of a private sale by the father, the sons and grandsons can only recover the property so lost to the family, if they show in the former case that the transfer was made for a debt contracted for an illegal or immoral purpose of which the purchaser had notice, and in the second case, subject to the further rule that the purchaser being a stranger to the suit, if he has not notice that the debt was so contracted, he is not bound to make inquiry beyond what appears on the face of the proceedings. (5)

1207. Their Lordships had not to consider the case of legal necessity, as it was abandoned—the only point pressed before them being that the mortgage was executed for an antecedent debt, which too was found against the plaintiff, even on the old interpretation of that term, but his Lordship defined it to mean a debt contracted "wholly apart from the ownership of the joint estate or of the security afforded or supposed to be available by such joint estate," (1) in other words, a purely personal debt of the father.

But it is doubtful if this is what their Lordships intended in view of their reference with approval to the following enunciation of the rule in the judgment of Sir John Stanley:—"The true rule is that the son cannot impeach an alienation of ancestral joint family property made by a father for which the consideration is an antecedent debt of the father not tainted with immorality or the object of which is to pay such debt.....The doctrine has no application to a case in which no antecedent debt of the father, that is, a debt antecedent to the alienation in question, is concerned as the consideration or object of the alienation." (2) If this is all their Lordships intended, then the term "antecedent debt" means that the debt must be one not only antecedent in point of time to the transfer but also independent of it. If the mortgagor received Rs 200 into his hands and then executed the mortgage as a security therefor, it could not be construed to be an antecedent debt, though such was the contention made before their Lordships. (3)

1208. Antecedent debt:—The liability of the son and the grandson to pay the father and the grand father's antecedent debt is both declared by the texts and enforced by the authorities. And the question is what is an antecedent debt. At one time that term was understood at least in three senses—(i) as meaning a debt merely anterior to the father's security though not independent of it; (4) (ii) a debt anterior merely to the suit in which it was sought to be recovered; (5) and (iii) lastly as a debt which was both anterior to and independent of the father's security sought to be enforced. (6)

1209. The last view has now received the imprimatur of the Privy Council. Antecedent debt, must then, mean a debt which was incurred not only prior to the security sought to be enforced but must be quite apart from and independent of it. If for instance, the father borrows Rs. 100 today and executes a bond therefor six months later, the question of its antecedency must depend upon the intention. If the father borrowed the sum agreeing to give the creditor a bond therefor six months later, the bond so given would not be for an antecedent debt because the two form part of the same transaction. If on the other hand, the father borrowed the money as a parcel debt, promising to pay it six months later and on his failure to pay it then, he gave him the bond as a security, then it would be a bond given for an antecedent debt.

1210. Of course, a bond may be partially for an antecedent debt and partially for a debt presently advanced. In that case the son's liability will be limited to the extent of the debt which is antecedent, or is supported by legal necessity, or benefit.

1211. An antecedent debt must of course, be itself not tainted with illegality or immorality. If A borrow money from B for an illegal purpose and he then borrows from C to pay off B, the fact that C has lent money to A to discharge his antecedent debt is not sufficient to validate his claim. He must further show either that he had made enquiry and was satisfied that the antecedent debt was legal or that it was in fact so. <sup>(1)</sup>

1212. Father's illegal or immoral debts.—The son is not liable to pay off his father's debts incurred for illegal or immoral purposes. Consequently, where the father's transfer has been made for a consideration tainted with illegality or immorality <sup>(2)</sup> the son is entitled to impugn it on that ground, and in that case the alienee may forfeit his property unless he is able to protect his alienation by appealing to some equity in his favour.

But since the right of the son to impeach his father's unwarranted alienation rests on the ground that he was a co-parcener on that date and that the father could not convey away his co-parcenary interest for a consideration not binding upon him, it follows that such a plea is not open to a son not born at the date of that transfer. <sup>(3)</sup>

1213. Where, however, the son was in existence at the date of the debt he is entitled to repudiate it if he can shew that it was incurred for a purpose which Hindu law regards as illegal or immoral. But here again though Hindu law may treat a transaction as illegal, if it is legal under the general law then it would not be open to the son to impeach the loan on the ground of its illegality. Such a plea was overruled in a case in which the plaintiff had lent money to the uncle and nephew being two members of a joint family, for the latter's marriage, being the cost he had to pay for his bride which law denounces as illegal and the marriage so brought about as the Asur marriage which it disapproves. It was pleaded for the defendants that the plaintiff had lent money for an illegal object and that, therefore, it could not be sued for. But the court held that the Asur form of marriage, though disapproved was not illegal, and was in fact quite customary and that, therefore, the loan could not be repudiated as made for an illegal purpose. <sup>(4)</sup>

1214. The illegal purposes which Hindu law enumerates afford a fair index of the character of the debt for which the son is not liable. Such are the debts incurred by the father for "spirituous liquors, for losses at play, for idle gifts, for promises made under the influence of love or wrath, or for suretyship or for the balance of a fine or toll liquidated in part by the father." <sup>(5)</sup> "Put into decent English, the texts amount to this: that the son is not to be held liable for debts which the father ought not, as a decent and respectable man, to have incurred. He is answerable for the debts legitimately incurred by his father; not for those attributable to his failings, follies, or caprices." <sup>(6)</sup>

(6) Per Curiam in Durbar v. Khachar, 82 B. 348 (851).

The act of the father may not be illegal in that it may not have contravened any express provision of law, but if it was wrongful and one contra bon mores then the son would not be liable. Such was the case of the father who had dammed up the plaintiff's watercourse for which the latter obtained damages against the father on whose death the decree was sought to be executed against the son, but the court held him not liable holding that though the father's obstruction of the watercourse may not have been illegal in the usual sense of the term, in that it may not have contravened any express provision of law, still since his act was wrongful sounding in damages, the son was not liable as the estate which he had inherited had received no benefit from that act.<sup>(1)</sup> For the same reason the son is not liable to pay a fine imposed upon the father,<sup>(2)</sup> or the costs saddled upon him in a false suit instituted by him as the next friend of his minor son to establish his alleged adoption.<sup>(3)</sup>

1215 But this was a false suit and not merely a suit not proved. In any case, the Calcutta Court holds the son liable for the cost of an unsuccessful litigation, however imprudent or illadvised it may have been, provided the father was not guilty of any criminal offence or of a breach of civil duty.<sup>(4)</sup> The Madras Court would exonerate the son even in the latter case<sup>(5)</sup>. In one case a decree had been passed against the father for dishonest misappropriation of the plaintiff's money, and yet the sons were held liable, the court observing: "No doubt this was a dishonest transaction on defendant's father's part, but the dishonesty is not of such a nature as absolves defendants from their pious obligation to discharge their father's debts. Much has been said in the course of the arguments as to the peculiar notions of Hindus as to what would amount to immorality or illegality in the origin of a debt, and allusion has been made to the exceptions to the rule of the pious obligation recognized by the commentators in the case of such liabilities as a toll or a fine. Without discussing the origin of these exceptions or the exact meaning that the words 'immoral' and 'illegal' bore to the minds of commentators on the Hindu law, it seems to us that there can be no question that debts of the nature of those found by the decree against defendant's father to be justly due by him to plaintiff, are not of an immoral or illegal nature, upon any reasonable view of the meaning of these words as used in the rule of Hindu law under consideration. That rule, as we understand it, is that sons are under a pious obligation to discharge the just debts of their father, because otherwise he would be liable to be punished in a future state for non-discharge of these debts. Upon any intelligible principle of morality, a debt due by the father by reason of his having retained for himself money which he was bound to pay to another would be a debt of the most sacred obligation, and for the non-discharge of which punishment in a future state might be expected to be inflicted, if in any. The son is not bound to do anything to relieve his father from the consequences of his own vicious indulgences, but he is surely bound to do that which his father himself would do were it possible, viz. to restore to those lawfully entitled the money he has unlawfully retained."<sup>(6)</sup>

1216. But in another case the very contrary was laid down. There the father who was a cashier in a firm had given security to the extent of Rs. 6,000. He misappropriated Rs. 8,000 of the firm's money and the firm obtained a decree against him for the amount of his security. The father died and the son was called upon to discharge his father's indebtedness, and the court refused to decree relief holding that the son was not liable to make good his father's defalcations which were clearly an illegal debt. (1) This case in its turn was sought to be distinguished in other cases in which two divisional Benches reaffirmed the previous view. (2) Both were cases of misappropriations of moneys entrusted to the father, and in both cases, the court held that the father was guilty of mere breaches of trust as distinct from criminal breaches of trust and that, therefore, being a mere violation of a civil duty, the son could not evade his liability for his father's debts. But in exactly similar cases the Calcutta (3) and the Allahabad (4) courts exonerated the sons holding that, in the first place, the father's liability did not amount to a "debt" and that even if it did, it was clearly tainted with either illegality or immorality. "The origin of this debt, if debt it was, was a theft committed by those persons who were sued." (5) But even these courts are by no means consistent with themselves: since a Calcutta case has upheld the son's liability to discharge a decree for mesne profits passed against the father (6) and the Allahabad Court decreed the father's liability incurred as surety for another against his son (7) on the authority of both the Madras (8) and Bombay precedents (9) though in such a case the Calcutta Court would disallow the claim. (10)

1217. The next question remains. What debt of the father must be deemed to be immoral? It is, of course, obvious that the father may borrow money for debauchery from A and then borrow more money from B to pay off A. Here B's debt cannot be repudiated by the son as immoral because it was advanced to satisfy an antecedent debt. But in such a case it will still be a question whether the debt was an "antecedent debt" within the meaning of law, which the son is under the legal duty to repay. Reserving this question for future consideration, the question of immorality must be considered in the light of Brihaspat's text already cited. According to him if the father incurs debt for drink or debauchery or reckless display or for any improper purpose it is immoral. "Neither sins nor the expiation of them are hereditary". (11) In order to be immoral, a debt must promote immorality. Any loan made to an immoral man does not become immoral. And regard must be had to the character of the loan. In one case a somewhat novel contention was made that the son was not liable to pay for the cloth purchased by the father who was a habitual drunkard. It was pointed out that there was no connexion between the two and the son could not evade his liability on the ground of his father's general immorality. (12) the question of pious obligation was not considered. (1) It is submitted that the real question is not one of the subsistence of the liability as held by the Madras court, or one of legal necessity as held by the Allahabad Court but rather one whether the acknowledgement of a barred debt should not be treated as "an idle gift" within the enumeration of Brihaspati's illegal debts. (2) But the question does not admit of a general answer. Suppose such an acknowledgment was necessary to obtain further credit which saved the family property from forfeiture or sale, could the son be heard to repudiate the debt merely on the ground that it had been revived after it had become barred by time? Such an acknowledgment might be supported even on the ground of necessity.

1219. It has been already stated that the co-parceners are not bound to pay a debt acknowledged by the manager after it is barred by time. It is, however, said, that though this is the rule, the fact that the son is under a pious obligation to pay his father's debt renders him liable to pay his barred debts if duly revived by an acknowledgment. It is conceded that without an acknowledgment the son would not be under any obligation to pay his father's barred debt. (3) But a barred debt is a good foundation for a written promise to pay signed by the party liable to be charged therewith. (4) The question then arises whether, if the father makes such promise, the son is bound to pay the debt. That he is, has been held in a case (5) in which the court observed: "The fact that the debt was barred by the Act of Limitation did not affect the existence of the debt and there was nothing illegal or immoral in the action of the father promising to pay it. The new note operated as a renewal of the obligation. It was a good debt and the son is bound to pay it from any assets of his father." (6) The Limitation applicable to a suit against the son depends upon the nature of the claim laid. Such a claim may be instituted—(i) against the son as a member of the joint family, or—(ii) by reason of his pious obligation or—(iii) because he is the heir and legal representative of the father. In the first case, if the suit is on a mortgage executed by the father and the suit is to enforce the mortgage, then the limitation would be as prescribed by article 132 and the starting point of limitation would be the accrual of the cause of action. (7) But if the suit be not on the mortgage, and if it is not binding on the son because the debt secured was neither antecedent nor supported by family necessity or benefit, then the courts hold the suit against him as still maintainable on the ground of his pious obligation to discharge his father's debt, and in that case it has been held, that as regards limitation, the suit would be subject to article 120 (8) from the date when the debt became payable.

1220. But these cases lie on the borderland between crimes and delicts upon which there is room for a difference of opinion. But there can be no doubt that where the father is clearly guilty of embezzlement (9) or forfeits a bond for keeping the peace, or for his good behaviour (10) the son is not bound to discharge his father's obligation.

1221. But the courts are not agreed on the subject of the son's liability to pay for his father's suretyship. The question cannot be answered in a general way without reference to the nature of the security given by the father, which though variously classed by other Smritikars, are thus classified by Brihaspati into four heads:—(i) for paying the debts of another; (ii) for delivery of the debtor's effects; (iii) for appearance; (iv) for honesty. (1) The son is expressly declared liable for the first two (2) and the only question is whether he is equally liable for the other two. The texts on the subject cannot all be reconciled, and the Bombay High Court holds the son actually bound in respect of the latter two kinds of security, holding that being an antecedent debt of the father, the son is prima facie bound, unless the son can shew it to be illegal or immoral. (3) But if he shows this, he will be exonerated from all liability without reference to the fact whether the surety is of the former or of the latter kind. In a later case in which the son's liability to discharge his father's liability as a surety is reaffirmed, it is held to extend no further to his grandson unless the grandfather had in becoming a surety received some consideration for it. (4) But it is submitted, that there is no distinction in principle between the liability of the son and that of the grandson, and the other courts do not discriminate between their liability. (5) In one case the father had executed a surety bond stipulating that the mortgagee could realize his claim from his land if he failed to realize it from the land of the debtor mortgaged to him. It was found that this bond was recklessly given without any necessity or benefit and though it was one reason given for dismissing the claim, the other and more substantial reason was that the creditor's remedy had become barred by time. (6)

109. Subject to any law for the time being in force and the nature of the estate, every co-parcener other than the father and the manager possesses the following rights in respect of the co-parcenary property:—

(1) He is, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, entitled to call for the partition of his share.

(2) Until partition he is entitled to joint possession.

(3) He may restrain any illegal or improper acts of the other co-parceners in respect of the co-parcenary.

(4) He and his wife and children are entitled to be maintained out of the co-parcenary funds.

(5) He may alien his share with the consent of his co par-

1222 Analogous Law:—The opening words "subject to any law for the time-being in force" save for instance, the Malabar Law under which members of a tarwad have no right of partition. It would save impartible estates and other property in respect of which there is no room for the existence of co-parcenary rights. For the rest, the section sums up the rights of the co-parceners interse. These rights are equally possessed by the manager qua co-parcener.

1223. Co-parceners' Rights:—So long as the family remains joint, every co-parcener must necessarily possess certain rights both against the manager as well against his co-parceners with reference to enjoyment of the joint property. These rights, however, must be necessarily subject to other laws and to the nature of the estate. Where, for instance, the property is impartible, members of the joint family have no right beyond the customary right of maintenance. So under the Dayabhag law, the sons have no right of partition against their father.

(1) Right of partition. Partition is commended by the Smritikars as multiplying religious rites:—

Manu :— Either let them live together, or, if they desire separately to perform religious rites, let them live apart : such religious duties are multiplied in separate houses, and their separation is therefore legal and even laudable. (1)

Partition, is, therefore, the birth right of every co-parcener. But as will be seen hereafter (2) though partition is commended and every co-parcener is prima facie entitled to enforce the partition of his share, certain restrictions upon the enforcement of that right have become established which limit the right of the Mitakshara member in the two following cases, namely:—

(1) A minor co-parcener of a Mitakshara family has no right of partition because it is not to his advantage unless it is shown that it would be for his benefit. This may be shown by proving that the manager or the co-parceners are wasting his property, or are acting in a manner hostile to his right, or that they refuse to provide him with maintenance ; or that otherwise, partition would protect his property and be to his advantage. (3)

(ii) The son has the right of partition only as against his immediate ancestor if he is alive, so that if the father is alive he has no right of partition against his father's father, and if the latter is alive he has no such right against his father's father's father. (4)

Then under the Bengal school the son has no right of partition against his father at all, though it is open to the father to make a partition if he so chooses. Otherwise, every co-parcener, whether male or female, is entitled to enforce partition of co-parcenary property. (5) So the widow of a deceased coparcener under the Dayabhag law has the right to claim by partition her husband's share. (6)

These are merely the broad principles which will have to be more closely examined in the chapter on Partition.

1224. The co-parcener is prima facie entitled to joint possession of all and every portion of the joint property. This right flows from the very fact of his jointness. No co-parcener is as of right entitled to specific possession of any portion of the joint property. His right is to obtain and maintain joint possession, not necessarily joint enjoyment, for it may not be possible. In the case of co-parcenary property joint possession does not imply the assertion of any right beyond those incident to his co-parcenership. As against the manager, he with his wife and children are entitled to be maintained and educated and married, and as against the other co-parceners he is entitled to retain joint possession.

1225. Where, however, any of them is allowed separate possession of the property he cannot disturb the status quo if such possession is not in denial of his right but in the enjoyment of his property. As Sir Barnes Peacock delivering the judgment of the Privy Council said: "It seems to their Lordships that if there be two tenants in common, and one A be in actual occupation of part of the estate, and is engaged in cultivating that part in a proper course of cultivation as if it were his separate property, and another tenant in common B attempts to come upon the said part for the purpose of carrying on operations there inconsistent with the course of cultivation in which A is engaged and the profitable use by him of the said part, and A resists and prevents such entry, not in denial of B's title, but simply with the object of protecting himself in the profitable enjoyment of the land, such conduct on the part of A would not entitle B to a decree for joint possession. Their Lordships are further of opinion that the decree of the District Judge so far as it orders an injunction to be issued, ought to be reversed. In India a large proportion of the lands, including large estates, is held in undivided shares, and if one share-holder can restrain another from cultivating a portion of the estate in a proper and husbandlike manner, the whole estate may, by means of cross-injunctions, have to remain altogether without cultivation until all the share-holders can agree upon a mode of cultivation to be adopted, or until a partition by metes and bounds can be effected, a work which, in ordinary course, in large estates would probably occupy a period including many seasons. In such a case, in a climate like that of India, land which had been brought into cultivation would probably become waste or jungle, and greatly deteriorated in value. In Bengal the courts of justice, in cases in which no specific rules exist, are to act according to justice, equity, and good conscience, and if, in a case of share-holders holding lands in common, it should be found that one share-holder is in the act of cultivating a portion of the lands which is not being actually used by another, it would scarcely be consistent with the rule above indicated to restrain him from proceeding with his work, or to allow any share-holder to appropriate to himself the fruits of others' labour or capital".<sup>(1)</sup> But as pointed out in another case, such exclusive possession by a co-owner can only be tolerated so long as it is not adverse, that is to say, amounts to dispossession of the other co-owners. His possession must be "in a way quite consistent with the continuance of joint ownership and possession".<sup>(2)</sup> He must not usurp separate possession, but must take it consistently with the rights of other co-parceners if they acquiesce in it. If when he takes it, any other co-parcener objects, he is entitled to sue for restoration of the status quo ante by obtaining an injunction or joint possession.<sup>(3)</sup> But if he has acquiesced in it his only remedy is by a suit for partition.<sup>(1)</sup> A co-parcener cannot sue another for the profits of his separate possession. <sup>(2)</sup> The separate possession of one co-parcener is not adverse to another unless his possession was in assertion of a hostile title or where his possession is from its nature, inconsistent with joint ownership. The fact that one erects a building on joint land does not necessarily constitute an ouster of the other co-parceners entitling them to a decree for joint possession. Ouster means dispossession of another in the assertion of a hostile title. <sup>(8)</sup>

1226. But this implies that the building was acquiesced in, or a least there was a standing by. Where one co-parcener commences to

Building on common land. build and the other objects, he is entitled to have the building pulled down and the land restored to the status quo ante. <sup>(4)</sup> In some cases the courts go into the question whether the defendant had appropriated more of the common land than would have come to him on partition <sup>(5)</sup> but it is submitted, that this is immaterial, since no co-parcener can be permitted to appropriate any specific part of the joint property without a partition in which all the co-parceners will get their full quantum of the common land, having regard to possession, quality and the amount of their shares. <sup>(6)</sup> "The law provides a legitimate means by which any co-sharer may obtain partition. The law does not favour one co-sharer, adversely to the other co-sharers, making a partition in his own favour, and selecting the portion of the land he likes by erecting a building upon it". <sup>(7)</sup> But even where the co-parceners have objected at the very start it does not necessarily follow that the court would decree demolition as a matter of course. Before it will do so it must be satisfied not only that there has been an encroachment on the common right, but that the co-parcenary rights have been injured and that they cannot be otherwise compensated for. <sup>(8)</sup>

1227. So where a co-sharer had excavated a tank on the joint land which the other co-sharer sued for filling up in order to restore the status quo ante the court held that before ordering it must be satisfied that the plaintiff had suffered some injury from the encroachment. The term "injury" in this connexion means "something substantial, something that materially affects the position of the parties." <sup>(9)</sup> The land in this case was described as "fit for cultivation" but the court held it no ground for ordering the refilling of the tank. But the result would probably have been different if the land had been actually under cultivation. In granting or withholding an injunction, the courts exercise a judicial discretion and weigh the amount of substantial mischief done or threatened to the plaintiff, and compare it with that which the injunction, if granted, would inflict upon the defendant. <sup>(10)</sup> Such was held to be the case where the defendant had converted a common staircase room to his own use and barred the plaintiff's right of access there through to his own part of the house, (1) though in a similar case while decreeing the removal of obstruction, the court remarked that it would not have interfered if there had been acquiescence, abandonment or non-user of the common way. (2) The same view was taken in another case in which the court ordered restoration of the common verandah which the defendant had pulled down, and which interfered with the plaintiff's enjoyment of the family dwelling house. (3)

1228. So the court will prevent building on joint lands, (4) but it will not interfere after the building is completed. (5) In suits for an injunction relating to joint property the courts in this country follow the practice of a court of equity in England limiting the exercise of their jurisdiction to acts of waste, illegitimate use of the family property, or acts amounting to ouster. (6) The same view was taken in another case in which the court ordered restoration of the common verandah which the defendant had pulled down and which interfered with the plaintiffs' enjoyment of the family dwelling house. (7)

1229. The manager may, of course, permit any member to occupy any portion of the joint property. (8) And it is usual and consistent with joint possession that some of the joint owners should be permitted exclusive possession of the joint property for their mutual convenience. Such possession is necessarily permissive and cannot be disturbed during the continuance of joint property. So it was observed in a case: "In our judgment, as we understand joint possession under Hindu Law, that peculiar exclusive possession of a plot of common dwelling house, or set of dwelling houses, which one member of a joint family obtains very commonly without an actual partition having come to between the members of the family, is a possession which must be referred to the continuing consent of his co-sharers. So long as no actual partition is come to, either as a result of a suit, or formally between the parties themselves, or evidenced by long acknowledgments on the part of the members of the family, the possession is merely that which for convenience sake, is conceded by all the members jointly to each one of them: and it may be put an end to, and a completely new arrangement come to at any time by the members of the family, if they think fit to make the change." (9)

1230. Every co-parcener possesses the right of restraining the other co-parceners including the manager, from doing any act which is illegal or improper and prejudicial to their joint interests. So where the manager had contracted to sell the right to cut wood in a forest for Rs. 4,000, secretly stipulating for payment of a like sum to himself, the court cancelled the whole contract holding that it was the right of a person defrauded by a contract between a manager and a third party to have the contract altogether rescinded. Even as between the parties who have entered into the contract to defraud a third party, the court will not enforce performance. (10)

1231. But apart from covin or fraud, the court will not interfere with the discretion of the manager, or an act of a co-parcener unless it is done on purpose to create a hostile title against the plaintiff. It was so held by Norman, J. who said: "Cases which show that courts of equity will not interfere where a tenant-in-common acting reasonably for the purpose of enjoying the property held in common, in any way in which an owner would enjoy such property without injury to his co-parcener—cases where such co-parcener either cuts down a tree, pulls down a wall, or builds up doors in a portion of the property held beneficially by him alone—are not analogous to that now before us. It is one thing to say that a court of equity will not interfere in such cases unless a substantial injury has been occasioned to the rights of the co-parceners, and another to say that it will hold its hand where there has been a direct infringement of a clear and distinct right of the plaintiff, such as the destruction of the verandah in dispute, which appears to us to have been a wilful and deliberate act on the part of the defendant for the purpose of creating a right as against the plaintiffs or injuring them." (1)

1232. As regards the right of co-parceners to impeach alienations of the joint property, the courts are now bound by the rules which they have laid down for their own guidance. They will be set out under the section where the subject of improper alienations will also be considered.

1233. The right of the co-parcener to his own maintenance as well as the maintenance of his wife and children has already been the subject of discussion in a previous chapter (Ch. VII). The joint family is bound to maintain not only the co-parcener and his family but also those who would have a legal or moral claim upon him for maintenance. Such are his parents and widowed daughters and unmarried sisters. Even co-parceners who are disqualified from inheritance are entitled to assert this right. Co-parceners' concubines if exclusively and continuously kept, become entitled to maintenance out of the joint estate on the death of their paramour. (2)

The illegitimate sons are also entitled to maintenance (3) which might be secured by a charge on the father's property. (4) While the co-parcener is entitled to maintenance for himself and his dependants, he cannot sue for it if he is entitled to a share. (5) Consequently, a suit for maintenance would be maintainable only by a minor or a disqualified co-parcener or in respect of property which is impartible. (6)

But in Madras a member of a tarwad is held entitled to claim separate maintenance where there is substantial inconvenience in living in the family house either on account of want of room there, or because there are quarrels which make it uncomfortable to a member to live there, where there are several houses belonging to the tarwad and a member lives in one of them, and where the karnavan's conduct has afforded a valid excuse for a member living away

1234. Right of alienation.—The following texts bear on the subject of this clause:—

Texts. Vyas—A single co-parcener ought not, without the consent of his co-parceners, to sell or give away immoveable property of any sort which the family hold in co-parcenary. (3)

Dayabhag—It should not be alleged that by the texts of Vyas (4) . . . one person has not power to make a sale or other transfer of such property. For here also (in the very instance of land held in common) as in the case of other goods, there equally exists a property consisting in the power of disposal at pleasure. (5)

Ib.—It is not true that in the instance of re-union (and of subsisting co-parcenary) what belongs to one, appertains also to the other parcener. But the property is referred severally to unascertained portions of the aggregate. Both parceners have not a proprietary right to the whole, for there is no proof to establish their ownership of the whole . . . (6).

1235. Neither the Mitakshara nor the Mayukh contains any reference to the subject under reference. They both of course allow (7) and so does Vyas, (8) the disposal of the family estate in case of necessity; but such disposal is quite apart and is not a disposal of a co-parcenary interest at the co-parcener's pleasure for his own private benefit.

1236. As Vyas is a sage of the Mitakshara school it is clear from the above texts that there is a radical difference of views between the Mitakshara and the Dayabhag school on the co-parcener's power of disposal of his undivided share. The Mitakshara prohibits it, the Dayabhag permits it. But the rigid orthodoxy of the Mitakshara denying the co-parcener any exercise of right over his property was impossible in practice. Consequently, even Jagannath had to admit that the words "ought not to sell" were merely hortatory and not imperative. (9) Moreover, the precept is merely limited to voluntary disposal. It does not extend to compulsory alienation, as for instance, in execution of a decree against the co-parcener. Such a decree might be passed for a debt or a delict but his personal law could not make him immune against his civil liability. Consequently, from the earliest times the Judges felt that "equity would require redress to be afforded to the purchaser by enforcing partition of the whole or of a sufficient portion of it, so as to make amends to the purchaser out of the vendor's share." (10) This was Colebrooke's personal opinion which Sir Thomas Strange adopted in his book and in his judgments (11) though his view was modified by his successors who prohibited such transfers except for emergency; (12) but later on in 1863 it was followed by Scotland, C. J., in a case (13) in which one of two brothers, members of an undivided family, had mortgaged one of their two houses for his own personal debt. Later on, another creditor sued and obtained damages against the mortgagor for trespass. In execution the sheriff seized the two houses and sold all the debtor's right title and interest therein to the plaintiff who sued the two brothers and the mortgagee for possession. The defence was that a co-parcenary interest was untransferable and the previous seven cases were relied upon. Scotland, C J., however, overruled the objection, holding both the mortgage and the execution good to the extent of the alienor's share, adding: "What the purchaser or execution creditor of the co-parcener is entitled to is the share to which if a partition took place, the co-parcener himself would be individually entitled, the amount of such share, of course, depending upon the estate of the family." (1)

1237. This settled the right of alienation both voluntary and involuntary for value in Madras and it has since been followed in several cases, (2) in which however, the same view was supported on the ground that the alienee had his alienor's right of partition but this raised another question, what was the alienee's remedy if the alienor should die before he obtained his share. It was held that the death of the alienor did not destroy the alienee's rights. (3) This raised still another question. Since the co-parcener's interest is variable, what date must be taken as fixing the amount of his interest available to his alienee. There are at least three dates possible—the date of the conveyance, the date of suit, and the date of the alienor's death. It has been held that the interest available at the time of alienation is all that would pass to the alienee (4) though it was at one time held that the interest which the alienee was entitled to was that possessed by alienor at the date of suit. (5)

1238. It is also held that since the co-parcener is entitled to no specific portion of the joint property what he should alien is his undivided interest in the joint property or in the particular property which is the subject of alienation. (6) He has no right to alien any specific property. (7) But if this rule is violated the alienee may still claim that on a partition, the specific property transferred to him should, as far as possible be allotted to his alienor's share for his benefit. (8) But the right which the purchaser obtains is not a right in rem. It is merely a personal right which he is equitably entitled to enforce in the manner stated. The transferor does not by his transfer cease to be a co-parcener and till the transferee obtains a specific share in lieu of his right he has no interest in the land of his transferor. (9) Consequently a purchaser from a co-parcener must as a rule sue for a general partition of the entire family property. (10)

1239. It will be thus seen that the right of alienation conceded to the co-parcener was necessitated by the equity of the purchaser. Accordingly it has been held that the co-parcener is not entitled to alien his share by gift (11) or devise (12) except that a co-parcener may renounce his share in favour of another. (13)

And as the right of alienation is evolved out of the right to enforce a partition, it follows that where a co-parcener had no right of partition, he has no right of transfer. Such is the position of co-parceners under the Malabar law: "The purchaser could not be permitted to stand in their shoes for the purpose of representing the joint family, or enforcing its right because he is a stranger to the family, and because the right of the family was not the interest that was sold or that is sought to be realized. If a similar sale by a co-parcener is upheld under Hindu Law to the extent of the vendor's share, it is upheld not by virtue of the right of interdiction, which he has as a representative of the family under Part II, Ch. 1. S. 1 § 28 of the Mitakshara, but because the co-parcener is at liberty to convert his interest into specific separate property by partition, and a purchaser for value has an equity to stand in the shoes of the vendor to that extent. This equity which rests on the partibility of ordinary Hindu property has no place in the Aliyasantana law which forbids compulsory partition altogether." (1) Then as regards the co-parcener's right of devise the same court said in another case: "We are of opinion that the will in the case referred to can take no effect. At the moment of death the right of survivorship is in conflict with the right of devise. Then the title by survivorship, being the prior title, takes precedence to the exclusion of that by devise." (2) The law of wills is evolved out of the law of gifts and as a gift of co-parcenary interest is invalid, so is the will.

1240. This view has been followed in Bombay where cases have followed a similar course. At first the right was altogether denied in cases decided upon the opinion of the Shastris, (3) then it was conceded, (4) and the whole case law was passed in review by Westropp, C. J. in 1873 in a case (5) which held it as the settled law of that Presidency, not only that one of several co-parceners in a Hindu family may, before partition, and without the assent of his co-parceners, sell, mortgage, or otherwise alien for valuable consideration his share in the undivided family estate, moveable or immovable, but also that such a share may be taken in execution under a judgment against him at the suit of his personal creditor. (6)

The case of gift had already been excluded in an earlier case (7) since affirmed in other cases.

1241. The same view has been followed in the Central Provinces, (8) where the court would even specifically enforce a contract to convey an undivided co-parcenary interest. (9) Other courts also recognise the rights of the transferee to this extent. (10)

1242. The same question applicable to the Mitakshara country subject to Bengal, U. P., Oudh and the Punjab. Calcutta High Court in 1869 who decided against the right of transfer, on the ground of stare decisis, holding that it had been the rule of property long and consistently acted upon in the courts of the Presidency. (1) In so holding Sir Barnes Peacock, C. J. said: "We are called upon to decide this case according to the Mitakshara law as we find it, and not according to our own views of policy. Whatever our opinions might be, in the absence of decided cases to which I have referred, I am of opinion that we should not be justified in unsettling the law by overruling that current of authorities by which, for nearly half a century, the law appears to have been settled, and in accordance with the principles of which it appears to have been gradually understood and acted upon." (2) This decision was approved by the Privy Council in a case decided by their Lordships in 1893 (3) in which it was held that the co-parcener was incompetent to alien his interest by treaty, with or without consideration. The Privy Council (4) have thus laid down the law for the Mitakshara and Mithila Provinces of Bihar, the United Provinces, (5) and Oudh (6) and the same view has been adopted in the Punjab. (7) Of course, it is a logical corollary from this view that what a co-parcener cannot alien to a stranger, he cannot equally alien it to one of his co-parceners, since even if such transfer be regarded as a surrender, it must be in favour of the general body of co-parceners, and not in favour of any one of them. (8)

As regards the co-parcener's disability to transfer his interest, these cases are then conclusive.

1243. But in such cases is the purchaser to lose his property and his money too? It was not long before this question forced itself to the forefront in a case decided in a divisional Bench in 1873 upon the following facts: The father of a joint family as its head, had taken a lease of certain villages, and to pay a part of the premium for it he mortgaged the family estate. The mortgagee sued on the mortgage, obtained a decree and in execution purchased the estate himself and entered into possession. His two sons, one a minor, sued the mortgagee for the cancellation of his mortgage and possession.

The mortgagee-purchaser pleaded necessity which was found wanting. The mortgagor then had no power as manager to mortgage the estate. His mortgage was then the mortgage by a co-parcener for his own benefit. It was found that the adult plaintiff was instrumental in carrying out and completing the mortgage transaction. He was, therefore, out of court. There still remained the minor son who was unquestionably entitled to a decree. But what decree? "For the moment then, let us reflect upon the consequence of allowing the property to be recovered by the minor unconditionally. The property is still family property; and it is recovered at the instance of the minor solely, because the father who affected to mortgage it, and the elder son, who acted with him and aided him in the transaction, could neither singly nor together, pass any title to the entirety or to any share in it. Consequently, the property, on going back, will come to be enjoyed by the joint family as it was before the mortgage and sale; and of necessity, by virtue of the provisions of the Mitakshara law, will return to the management of the very defendant second party, who obtained Rs. 3,000 from defendant first party on the pretended security afforded by the mortgage of it. This does not seem to accord very well with equity and good conscience." (1) Then referring to the Full Bench case, the court said that it did not fetter its discretion, and continued to observe that the father had unquestionably the right of enforcing a partition of his share and on partition, he could, of course, mortgage it. Even as the father could have obtained the separation of his share for delivery to his creditor to whom he was equitably bound to make good the representation he had made that he had the power to mortgage it, and that being clearly the equity to which the mortgagee was entitled, the court charged the mortgage money with interest upon the shares of the father and his consenting son.

Referring to this decision, the Privy Council said: "There appears to be substantially little difference between the law thus enunciated and that which has been established at Madras and Bombay, except that the application of the former may depend upon the view the judges may take of the equities of the particular case, whereas the latter establishes a broad and general rule defining the right of the creditor". (2)

1244. The difference between the Bengal and the Bombay views are thus reduced to a minimum, but they are still of considerable importance. In the first place, while under the Bombay and the Madras views the equity of the alienee has established a positive right in favour of alienation for value, the equity in Bengal does not affect the invalidity of alienation but places the plaintiff upon terms which postulate that the alienee was a bona fide transferee without notice of the defect in his alienor's title. Again, since it is merely an equity against the alienor by reason of his erroneous representation, it follows and has been held, that it dies with the death of the alienor, upon which his share passes by survivorship to persons who are not liable for the debts and obligations of the deceased. (3)

1245. But nevertheless these decisions left the matter in an unsatisfactory state, and referring to them Sir James Colville said:

(5) Transfer of co-parcenary interest. "The right of co-parceners to impeach an alienation made by one member of the family without the authority, express or implied, has of late years been frequently before the courts of India, and it cannot be said that there has been complete uniformity of decision respecting it". (1)

1246. In another case decided in the following year the same high tribunal said: "Their Lordships are not disposed to extend the doctrine of the alienability by a co-parcener of his undivided share without the consent of the co-sharers beyond the decided cases. In the case of Suraj Bansi Koer v. Sheo Pershad Singh (2) above referred to, they observed: "There can be little doubt that all such alienations, whether voluntary or compulsory, are inconsistent with the strict theory of a joint and undivided family (governed by the Mitakshara law), and the law as established in Madras and Bombay, has been one of gradual growth, founded upon the equity which a purchaser for value has, to be allowed to stand in his vendor's shoes, and to work out his rights by means of a partition. The question, therefore, is not so much whether an admitted principle of Hindu Law shall be carried out to its apparently logical consequences, as what are the limits of an exceptional doctrine established by modern jurisprudence." (3) This was a case where the father had bequeathed his undivided share by will which according to the view of the Madras court could not be upheld, since at the time of death the right of survivorship is in conflict with the right by devise; and the title by survivorship, being the prior title, takes precedence to the exclusion of that by devise. (4)

1248. In Bengal the alienation of such right was, however recognized from early times. But as regards the other provinces the courts were divided (5) some holding the alienation valid if made for value, while others adhering to the orthodox view that co-parcenary right was in any case incapable of transfer. The former view was forced on the court by the equity in favour of the purchaser for value without notice. Such purchaser received an added strength to his claim by reason of his being a purchaser at a court sale held in execution of a decree against the joint family.

1249. It was agreed and it is the law that the manager has the power to transfer the joint family property for legal necessity. But if suppose such necessity was only partial or such as bound only the immediate party to the contract, then justice requires that the innocent transferee should be protected, and the only means of protecting him was to sell the manager's own share in the co-parcenary property. Again, a co-parcener might commit a tort in which case he could not escape his liability to pay damages. In that case the party wronged is entitled to bring his co-parcenary interest to sale which could not be refused. (6) This was then the thin end of the wedge. The right was at first conceded to the auction purchaser, then to all purchasers and lastly extended to all transferees for value.

1250. But this last development has not influenced the courts in Calcutta<sup>(1)</sup> and Allahabad,<sup>(2)</sup> which have resisted all efforts to extend the power of transfer beyond a compulsory sale in execution of a decree against a co-parcener. And as the Privy Council do not favour any extension of the right of transfer of his undivided interest by a co-parcener beyond the decided cases, there is no prospect of any further development of law in the direction of alienability.

1251. Present state of law.—The present state of the law is then as follows :—

Both in Bombay and in Madras a co-parcener is entitled to sell, mortgage or otherwise alienate for valuable consideration his share in the undivided family estate, whether moveable or immovable, without the assent of his co-parceners. It is also settled law in the same two presidencies that a share in the undivided estate of a Hindu family may be taken in execution under a judgment against the co-parcener to whom such share belongs at the suit of his personal creditor.<sup>(3)</sup>

Under the Bengal system a co-parcener being absolutely free to alien his share for value or without, the question of consideration does not arise.

But in Bombay and Madras where such transfers are only allowed for valuable consideration, it will be for the court to consider in each case whether the consideration is real or illusory. If it is the latter, the court may treat the transfer as valid.

In the Mitakshara territory other than the Central Provinces, since a direct transfer is not legal, the only right which the purchaser possesses, is equitable and the court will mould the remedy according to his equity.

1252. Involuntary transfer.—These variations only refer to voluntary alienations. They have no application to an involuntary transfer which stands on higher ground, and is governed by a different set of rules. So the Privy Council said: "But however nice the distinction between the rights of a purchaser under a voluntary conveyance and those of a purchaser under an execution sale may be, it is clear that a distinction may, and in some cases does exist between them. It is sufficient to instance the seizure and sale of a share in a trading partnership at the suit of a separate creditor of one of the partners. The partner could not himself have sold his share so as to introduce a stranger into the firm without the consent of his co-parceners, but the purchaser at the execution sale acquires the interest sold with the right to have the partnership accounts taken in order to ascertain and realize its value. It seems to their Lordships that the same principle may and ought to be applied to shares in a joint and undivided Hindu estate, and that it might be so applied without unduly interfering with the peculiar status and rights of the co-parceners in such an estate, if the rights of the purchaser at the execution sale be limited to that of compelling the partition, which his debtor might have compelled, had he been so minded, before the alienation of his share took place".<sup>(4)</sup> In other words, a co-parcenary interest may be attached and sold in execution of a decree against the co-parcener and the purchaser thereupon acquires the same right to enforce a partition as his vendor had in the joint property. But this he can only do during the life-time of the judgment-debtor, (1) unless he died after the attachment, (2) or was the father, in which case the pious obligation of the sons to pay their father's debt will entitle the purchaser to work out the rights which he has acquired by means of a partition. (3) But in any other case the purchaser will, on the death of his vendor, lose the property and his money too. (4)

1253. The question whether such purchaser takes subject to any prior incumbrance created by the debtor depends upon the personal law of the debtor. In Bengal, Bombay, Madras and the Central Provinces where a co-parcenary interest may be mortgaged, the purchaser would be naturally bound whether he had or had no notice of the incumbrance, which being valid, creates a right in rem enforceable against all subsequent transferees. But in the other Mitakshara country since such mortgages are invalid it follows that they create no charge which can have priority over purchases at execution sales made bona fide and without notice of it. (5)

In such a case the mortgagee's remedy is to obtain a decree upon his mortgage and to attach the interest in execution of his decree. Of course, in such cases the mortgagee will only rank as an attaching creditor but that is a contingency which he should have been prepared for when he took the mortgage. (6)

1254. Transfer with consent of co-parceners.—Both according to the text as well as precedents, it is open to any co-parcener subject to the Mitakshara restriction to alien his share with the consent of the other co-parceners. (7) The restriction only applies to a transfer without consent (8) and without legal necessity or benefit to the family. (9)

Since a member of a joint family cannot validly mortgage his undivided share in ancestral property held in co-parcenary on his own private account without the consent of his co-parceners, it follows that a mortgage by a father of joint family property not made to satisfy an antecedent or for a legal necessity or benefit of the family, is not binding even as to his share in the ancestral property comprised in it, and no decree can be passed for the sale of his share under the mortgage. (10) The only course open to the mortgagee is, of course, to sue for the mortgage money and then to attach the property in execution.

1255. Valuable consideration.—The question what constitutes valuable consideration must be decided with reference to the general law. Past and future services may amount to sufficient consideration. (11)

alienation as well as one born subsequently to it, are both equally entitled to sue to set it aside. But the court will grant relief subject to the equities of the purchaser. Where therefore, the alienation is set aside, the court should order that the property should be possessed in defined shares and the shares of the transferee should be subject to the lien of the transferee for the return of the purchase money, on the ground that the co-parcener must make his share available for payment of his just dues and fulfilment of his obligations (1) Where a member of a joint Mitakshara family executes a deed of sale in respect of a joint property, his co-parceners who were not parties to the deed, would be entitled to maintain a suit for recovery of possession within 12 years from the time when the alienee took possession of the property. (2)

1257. The head of a joint Mitakshara family mortgaged in 1886 property be'longing to the joint family, but neither for legal necessity nor to pay an antecedent debt. In 1888 the mortgagor sold the same property to a third person. The purchaser remained in possession for more than twelve years, when the mortgagees instituted a suit for sale on their mortgage. It was held that in view of the fact that the purchaser had acquired a title to the property by adverse possession as against all the members of the family, it was open to him, notwithstanding that his title was originally acquired from the mortgagor alone, to set up as a defence the invalidity of the mortgage. (3)

1258. The co-parcener's interest is either variable or invariable according to the law to which he is subject. In Bengal where co-parceners hold in quasi sevaralty as tenants in common with no right of survivorship, the interest of each member is determined on the death of the father and remains fixed till partition. Under the Mitakshara, however, since co-parcenary interest is the birthright of every male member of the family, that interest is necessarily subject to increase or decrease according to the births, deaths and other circumstances elsewhere set out.

1259. So long as the family is joint, a coparcener is necessarily precluded from appropriating any specific portion of the joint property or of its profits, as he has no definite share until partition. (4) But a co-parcener may obtain possession in common with a purchaser who has obtained separate possession without partition of specific undivided property in which such co-parcener has an undivided and unascertained share. (5)

1260. All schools now recognize the right of separate ownership. A co-parcener is not disqualified by reason merely of his possession of an interest in joint property from obtaining or acquiring any property of his own.

Manager's fraud.

110. No manager can exercise his power in fraud of the co-parceners.

1261. Analogous Law.—This principle is deducible from the texts already cited (1152). Even the father cannot defraud his son under the mask of a pious gift to an idol. (1)

111. (1) An ancestral family trade devolves upon members of a joint undivided family and the partnership is not dissolved by the death of any of the members, nor can any one of the partners when severing his connection with the business, ask for an account of past profits and losses.

(2) Where a joint Hindu family carries on an ancestral trade, it becomes a trading family and is then governed—not by the rules of co-parcenership—but by the co-parcenary rules as modified by the incidents and exigencies of trade.

(3) In particular and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing principle, the rules applicable to them are as follows :—

(1) Any member may be appointed the accredited manager and agent of the firm.

(2) Such manager or agent may carry on the trading business of the firm :

(3) And for that purpose, he may pledge the credit of the joint family :

(4) He is not accountable to them for past profits and losses :

(5) Though, whether major or minor, all members are equally liable to the extent of their shares for payment of such debts irrespective of whether they were incurred for necessity of the firm or whether the creditor had not inquired into the purpose and necessity of the loan—

(6) And even if the manager had incurred loans with intent to defraud the family.

(7) The manager may sue or be sued on behalf of firm without being under the necessity of impleading its other members.

Explanation.—The rules here in before stated are equally applicable whether the trading business be an ancient family business or one started by the joint family; or whether it be carried on by the family alone or in partnership with an outsider, provided that where the business is not ancestral the share of the minor co-parcener is not liable without reference to legal necessity or benefit of the family.

Exception.—But nothing herein before contained applies to a trading partnership composed only of certain members of a joint family with or without outsiders.

1262. Analogous Law.—A joint Hindu family carrying on an ancestral trade may be regarded as a trading firm, and as such, is subject to the ordinary law of partnership, or it may still continue to possess all the rights and incidents of a joint Hindu family. It may again be that such a family may carry on its trading business in partnership with a stranger, or that only some of its members might with capital, which is not family property, embark upon such an enterprise on their own account, or in partnership with others. But it is clear that in such cases the rules of joint family cannot apply to the exclusion of the law of partnership. (1) It is only when the family as a whole or through any of its members, continues an ancestral trade out of its joint family funds, that it is subject to the law of joint family necessarily accommodated to that of partnership.

If the law were otherwise, the birth of a son (2) or the death of any member of the family (3) would have had the effect of dissolving the partnership and if it was to continue, it could only be by a fresh agreement made each time that there was a birth or death in the family.

1263. But the very contrary is expressly laid down in the Mitakshara as applicable to trading partnerships:—"When one of those who trade in partnership goes abroad and dies, then his share shall be taken by his descendants such as sons, etc., Bhandhus and Sapindas, and in default of them all by the King." (4) Then again, while partners as such are mutually accountable to one another for past profits and losses (5) partners under the rule are not so accountable. (6) Under the Hindu Law a joint family which carries on its trade handed down from its ancestors, becomes a trading family, trade being one of its Kulachars or family practice, which attracts to itself all the necessary incidents of trade, (7) without which the trade may not be able to continue. It is indeed evident that a trading business must enter into many transactions, purchase and sell property and borrow money which cannot all confirm to the narrower rules applicable to the management of a joint family. They cannot possess all the facilities of a trader and yet be not subject to the rules which make those facilities possible. They cannot be permitted to contract with the outside public in the course of that trade and then refer to their personal laws for evading their liabilities. Where therefore, a minor was the sole survivor of such partnership, his guardian is entitled to carry on an ancestral trade on behalf of the minor who will be bound by all acts of the guardian necessarily incidental to or flowing out of the carrying on of the trade. <sup>(1)</sup> So while in the case of a normal family, the managing member can only contract debts for the necessity or benefit of the joint family and the creditor is bound to enquire into the purpose of the loan, <sup>(2)</sup> no such limit can be placed on the borrowing power of the managing member of a family trade and the rule is, that he possesses an implied authority to contract debts for its purpose and the creditor is not bound to enquire into the purpose of the debt in order to bind the whole family thereby because that power is incidental to and is necessary for the very existence of the family trade.

1264. Where any co-parcener is a minor the ordinary rule is that his share in the family property is liable for debts contracted by his managing co-parcener for any family purpose or any purpose incidental to it. If the family is a trading firm, that rule is varied and his share becomes liable for debts incurred for trading purposes and any purpose incidental to it. Consequently, where the manager drew hundis in the name of his firm without the knowledge of other members of the firm and without any advantage to the firm, it was held that the drawee and his endorsee were entitled to hold the firm liable and bind its minor member's share without proof of any necessity or benefit to the minor. <sup>(3)</sup> Persons dealing with the manager of a trading firm are not affected by his dishonesty and the fact that the co-parcener affected is a minor, is immaterial. <sup>(4)</sup>

1265. It is not even necessary that the junior member should be impleaded in the suit, <sup>(5)</sup> but of course a suit on behalf of the firm must be instituted by or against its manager. Any other member cannot sue without impleading all the members. <sup>(6)</sup> In the ordinary joint family, the father, and in his absence, the senior member is the manager. But in a trading partnership this is unnecessary, since the family may authorize any one of its members to act as their agent in any business transaction subject to the same rule that when a joint family or any members of it carry on trade in partnership and contract with the outside public in the course of that trade, they have no greater privileges than any other traders. If they are really partners they must be bound by the same rules for enforcing their contracts in courts of law as the members of any other partnership. (1)

1266. These general principles may now be examined and illustrated in detail.

1267. In an ordinary joint family, the office of the manager is determined by his age and hereditary rights and not necessary by his competency. In a trading family, such a course if permitted, might lead to disastrous results. Consequently it is settled that the manager of a trading family may be such person as the family appoints or holds out as its accredited representative. (2) He need not be the conventional karta of the Hindu household. It may be that such karta may regulate the internal management of his household but in its trade relations with the outside world the manager might be quite a different person. This is a question of fact to be decided upon the facts of each case.

1268. Such manager has all the powers necessary for the purpose of carrying on a family trade. But he must professedly act in that capacity. When therefore, the manager of a family firm mortgaged certain family properties by a mortgage-deed which showed that the debt was to be recovered from him personally, from all kinds of goods and property belonging to him, but the manager signed the mortgage as owner of the firm, in a suit by the mortgagee against the manager and his minor co-parceners, it was held that the mortgage did not bind the undivided property of the family and nothing could pass beyond the property specifically mortgaged. (3) It was further held (it is submitted wrongly) that even as regards the mortgaged property, the interest of the minors therein was not liable for the debt unless the plaintiff proved that when he lent the money, he reasonably believed that it was required for the family business. That this is by no means necessary was decided by the same court in a later case in which it was held that a minor was liable to the extent of his share in the firm on bills or notes drawn by the manager in the name of the firm but in fraud of it and for purposes unconnected with it. (4) In so holding Chandavarkar, J., said: "In carrying on such a trade, infant members of the undivided family will be bound by all acts of the manager (or the adult member acting as the manager) which are necessarily incidental to or flowing out of the carrying on of that trade . . . The power of a manager to carry on a family trade necessarily implies a power to pledge the property and credit of the family for the ordinary purpose of the trade." (5) Sausse, C. J., observed in another case: "Third parties in the ordinary course of bona fide trade dealings, should not be held bound to investigate the status of the family, whilst dealing with him on the credit of the family property." (6)

1269. So it has been held that the rule of English law according to which none but those whose signatures appear on a bill of exchange or a negotiable promissory note can be sued thereupon, has no application in India so as to preclude the payee of a promissory note when suing the maker, from enforcing his rights against third parties who according to Hindu Law, may in respect of family property in their hands, be responsible for such debts. Section 27 of the Negotiable Instruments Act has no application to a case where a person who is not a party to a promissory note or other similar instrument is sought to be made liable in respect of the money due thereunder in consequence of an obligation cast on him by his personal law in respect of such debts. (1) But of course the family firm is only liable for the debts incurred by the manager acting for the family. It will not be liable for the manager's debts incurred under circumstances which would not bind any other partnership. Consequently, while the firm is liable for all acts done by the manager in the ordinary course of his duties and within the scope of his authority it cannot be held liable for a fraud committed by the manager outside the scope of his authority and wholly unconnected with his business. (2) As Willes, J., observed: "With respect to the question whether a principal, is answerable for the act of his agent in the course of his master's business and for his master's benefit, no sensible distinction can be drawn between the case of fraud and the case of any other wrong. The general rule is, that the master is answerable for every such wrong of his servant or agent as is committed in the course of his service and for the master's benefit though no express command or privity of the master be proved." (3)

1270. As such, the manager may pledge the credit of joint family to its uttermost and it is immaterial that there are minors (4) and widows (5) to be maintained. Neither the one nor the other, has any precedence over his trade debts which may be realized out of the family assets without reference to the doctrine of necessity or benefit in the one case, and of the duty of maintenance and residence in the other.

1271. As Sausse, C J., put it,—“Were such a power not implied, property in a family trade which is recognized by the Hindu Law to be a valuable inheritance would become practically valueless to the other members of an undivided family wherever an infant was concerned. For no one would deal with a manager if the minor were to be at liberty, on coming of age, to challenge as against third parties, the trade transactions which took place during his minority.” (6) family liable. <sup>(1)</sup> The debt here was not incurred even professedly for the family, nor was the toddy shop a family business. If however, in such a case the manager had professed to borrow for the family and misapplied the proceeds to his toddy business, then the result would have been different. <sup>(2)</sup> But of course, where a person acts as a manager of two firms it is upon persons dealing with him to ascertain for which firm he was at the moment acting. And while under the Hindu Law, it is open to the members of a family to claim under certain circumstances the benefits arising from a business carried on by one of the members, still until this is done, or until the business is in some way adopted as an asset of the family, no liability can be imposed on the other members for the debts of the business. <sup>(3)</sup>

1273. The manager of a family firm is not accountable to the family for past profits and losses <sup>(4)</sup> though he would be so in a case of pure partnership. <sup>(5)</sup> The reason of this rule is that a joint family still remains a joint family and in its internal management the rights and liabilities of the members remain unaffected by reason of the fact that it carries on a family trade. As there is, ordinarily, no right to call for past accounts in a joint family inter se, so the right of the members is not enlarged by the nature of the business of the family.

1274. On the other hand from the very nature of the business, there can be no discrimination between the adult and minor members of the family. They share alike the profits and bear alike the losses incident to the joint trade. As Sausse, C. J., observed in a case already cited <sup>(6)</sup>: "In carrying on such a trade, infant members of the undivided family will be bound by all acts of the manager, or the adult members acting as managers, which are necessarily incident to and flowing out of the carrying on of that trade, whether it be singly or with a co-parcener. The power of a manager to carry on a family trade necessarily implies a power to pledge the property and credit of the family for the ordinary purposes of that trade, and third parties in the ordinary course of bona fide trade dealings should not be held bound to investigate the status of the family represented by the manager whilst dealing with him on the credit of the family property. Were such a power not implied, property in a family trade, which is recognized by Hindu Law to be a valuable inheritance, would become practically useless to the other members of an undivided family, whenever an infant was concerned, for no one would deal with a manager if the minor were to be at liberty on coming of age to challenge as against third parties, the trade transactions which took place during his minority. The general benefit of the undivided family is considered by Hindu Law to be paramount to any individual interest and the recognition of a trade as inheritable property, renders it necessary for the general benefit of the family that the protection which the general Hindu Law generally extends to the interests of a minor should be so far trenced upon as to bind him by acts of the family manager necessary for the carrying on and consequent preservation of that family property, but that infringement is not to be carried beyond the actual necessity of the case." (1)

1275. The question then arises, what are the actual necessities of the case and by what tests are they to be decided. It was admitted that "it is not easy to draw a well-defined line between what is, and what is not incident to the carrying on of a trade." (2) In the case from which these excerpts are quoted, the surviving partners of a firm in the absence of a representative of a deceased partner, had adjusted the partnership accounts and had agreed to hand over a portion of the partnership property to one of the partners in compromise of his claim. The property so delivered was ancestral, and the Court held that the transfer of partnership property was not an act necessarily incident to the carrying on of a trade but should be left to be governed by the law applicable to the ordinary dealings with the manager of an undivided family when the interests of an infant member are concerned. (3)

1276. Apart however from such re-adjustment of rights and liabilities inter se, no member of a trading firm, whether adult or minor, can repudiate a debt incurred by the manager acting on behalf of the firm even though it be done with intent to defraud it. It was so held in a case in which the manager of a co-parcenary trading firm of a joint Hindu family had signed some promissory notes in the name of his ancestral firm to accommodate his friend with funds without consulting his munim and without any advantage to his own firm. In short, he saddled upon his firm a gratuitous liability from which the firm could gain nothing and still it was held that the firm was liable, though as regards the minor, his liability was restricted to the extent of his share. (4) A similar question arose in Madras when it was further pointed out that the liability must be restricted to the minor's share in the business but could not be extended to his other property. (5) As was observed in another case: "As regards the other property in the hands of a co-parcener, no other co-parcener, whether he be the manager or not, has any title whatever. The legal individuality of a co-parcener is not merged in the manager so far as the co-parcener's self-acquired or other separate property is concerned." (6) Of course the case would have been different, if in such a case, the manager had himself defrauded the firm, as where he had entered into a transaction with himself with intent to defraud the firm of which he was a member. (7)

1277. In the cases decided under the old Code of Civil Procedure of 1882 there was a conflict of views as to who were necessary or proper plaintiffs in a suit instituted on behalf of a trading partnership. In some cases the managing partner was held competent to sue, (8) while in others his competency was questioned. (1) The subject has now been much simplified by the addition of O. 30 in the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, which prescribes a special procedure for the institution of such suits. The right of suit would seem to be subject to the following (2) rules : (i)—a person who enters into a contract in his own personal name is entitled to sue alone; (3) (ii)—where it is entered into the name of a trading firm all members must ordinarily join, but (iii)—where such firm is a joint family, then the rule of Hindu Law permits the manager to sue in his representative capacity on behalf of the family as regards its property. (4)

1278. Exceptional cases:— It has already been postulated that the special

rules modifying the general law of joint family property only apply to a trading family. They have no application to cases where only some members of the family enter into a trading partnership to the exclusion of others (5) or in partnership with outsiders (6) which must be subject to the ordinary law of partnership. Of course, one or more members of a joint family may start a trading business and afterwards admit his other co-parcener into the business impressing upon it the character of a joint family business. (7) Even then it would fail to be an ancestral trade to which the peculiar incidents, before set out, apply. Even where the family starts a new trade it is presumed to be with the consent of all adult co-parceners who are hable to the same extent as if the trade were ancestral; the only difference being as regards the minors whose shares cannot be held liable without reference to legal necessity or benefit. Where, however, the new business has developed out (8) of the old or is on the same lines, it is scarcely distinguishable from an ancient business for which all are equally bound.

1279. Rules applicable to Kutchi Memons.— The special rules and incidents applicable to Hindu family firms have been held to apply equally to Kutchi Memons who like the Hindus, possess therein the right of survivorship and the death of a member has not the effect of dissolving the firm. (9)

CHAPTER IX.

DAYABHAG JOINT FAMILY.

112. In a family comprising the father and his sons and grandsons, the father is absolutely entitled to all property whether ancestral, or his self-acquired property.

Dayabhag family with father as head.

Synopsis.

1280. Analogous Law.—The following texts support the section :—

Dayabhag :—If sons have property in their father's wealth, partition would be demandable even against his consent, and there is no proof that property is vested by birth alone, nor is birth stated in the law as a means of acquisition <sup>(1)</sup>

Hence (that is, because property is not vested in sons, while the father lives, or because property is not by birth, but by survival or because the demise of the ancestor is a requisite condition) the passage cited beginning with the words "after the death of the father" <sup>(2)</sup> being intended to declare that property vested at that period (namely at the moment of the father's decease) recites partition which, of course, then awaits the pleasure (of the successor). For it cannot be a precept, as the same result respecting the right of partition at (pleasure) was already obtained (as the necessary consequence of a right of property). <sup>(3)</sup>

1281. Dayabhag family.—A Dayabhag joint family may have the father as its head, or it may be a family comprising the brothers and nephews with a head other than the father. In the first case, so long as the father is the head of the family, he is the sole master of all its property, whether ancestral or self-acquired. His sons and grandsons possess no right over him. They cannot enforce a partition or exercise any of the rights of a Mitakshara co-parcener. The father is not even bound to maintain his adult sons or grandsons, though he is bound to maintain his minor sons, <sup>(4)</sup> his unmarried daughters, <sup>(5)</sup> his wife <sup>(6)</sup> and his parents. <sup>(7)</sup> Under the Mitakshara, the father is under a legal duty to maintain his son's widow, but under the Dayabhag the son having no vested interest in his father's property, his widow has equally no legal claim for her maintenance. Her claim upon her father-in-law for maintenance is merely moral and unenforceable in a court of law. <sup>(8)</sup> But she has a legal claim to be maintained by her husband's brother if he inherited property from his father, in which case the moral obligation of the father becomes a legal obligation of the son. <sup>(9)</sup> The mother is entitled to maintenance, and is allotted a share in lieu of maintenance. <sup>(10)</sup> With the exception of the "outcaste and his son" all disqualified members of the family are entitled to maintenance, <sup>(11)</sup> the son of the outcaste being entitled to a share of the inheritance.

1282. The absolute ownership of the Dayabhag father may be emphasized by the fact that the son does not acquire any right against him even by estoppel. So where the son constructed a house with money of his own on a plot of land belonging to the father, he could not claim even joint ownership thereon with the father, <sup>(1)</sup> and the father had the right of turning him out of the house, even though he had allowed and encouraged the son to spend large sums of money for that purpose. <sup>(2)</sup> In such cases there can be no estoppel against the father, since the son is presumed to know the law, though the father would equitably be bound to pay for the improvements he had encouraged his son to make. <sup>(3)</sup>

113. Except where the father is alive, the Dayabhag joint family is as regards its management and the rights of members, subject to the same rules as the Mitakshara family, except that :—

- (a) A co-parcener may alien his share by sale, mortgage, gift or devise :
 (b) Women are not disqualified from becoming co-parceners.

Synopsis.

 (2) Right of member to alienate his share (1285). (4) Presumption of joint acquisition in Dayabhag family (1287).

1283. Analogous Law.—Except that the father under the Dayabhag school possesses absolute power over the family estate, whether ancestral or self-acquired, a Dayabhag family without the father is indistinguishable from a Mitakshara family with only two exceptions set out in the two clauses.

1284. In all other respects the powers and duties of the manager of families subject to the two schools are identical. The manager may contract debts for the joint family for which its members would be liable, and a decree passed against the manager would bind them even though they were not parties to the suit. <sup>(4)</sup> It has been held that the manager is accountable to the other members, and in this respect the Dayabhag manager is subject to an added liability <sup>(5)</sup> but this view is not supported by any special rule of the Dayabhag school, but maintains his liability to account which is inconsistent with the fundamental idea of co-parcenership. <sup>(6)</sup>

so even by gift or devise. His transferee has not merely an equity to a partition but acquires a title to his co-parcener's share of which he may enforce a partition by metes and bounds.

Again, while a Mitakshara minor co-parcener can only claim partition upon special grounds, the Dayabhag minor may do so as of right. To borrow a term from the English law the Dayabhag co-parceners are as regards their rights, tenants-in-common.

1286. As such, it follows that they have no right of survivorship. Consequently, if of two brothers one should die, his widow becomes a co-parcener with the other and is entitled to enforce all the rights of her deceased husband. (1)

The Dayabhag makes no distinction between moveable and immoveable property inherited by a female as heiress of a male relative. She has the same powers and is subject to the same restrictions as regards management and alienation. (2)

1287. It is stated that the presumption of the Mitakshara law that acquisitions made in the names of the individual members, while the family remains joint, are joint property, is not applicable to a joint family under the Dayabhag school, under which it is incumbent upon a person alleging any property to be joint at least to prove the existence of an original nucleus with the aid of which the property sought to be partitioned, has been increased and amplified. (3) But in a subsequent case it was explained that the Mitakshara rule equally applies to a Dayabhag family. (4)

CHAPTER X.

DEBTS.

1288. Topical Introduction.—In a previous chapter the right of the manager and of the father to contract debts and make alienations of joint property has been already set out. And in discussing the right of co-parcener against the manager his right to challenge the former's invalid transfers has also been alluded to. But the rights of the family against strangers and vice versa still remain. They are of sufficient importance to deserve a separate chapter. As will be presently seen the equity in favour of the alienee is entirely a modern graft upon the archaic Hindu Law where it finds no place. The protection of the creditor or the alienee who advances a loan or receives a transfer for valuable consideration after due enquiry without notice, is an equitable rule of the civil law which has found a place in the jurisprudence of all nations. It has equally become embedded as an integral rule of Hindu Law. In some other respects also Hindu Law has been overshadowed by the statute law, the combined effect of which will be found set out in the ensuing sections, some of which deal with the burden of proof, a subject which occupies no inconspicuous place in Hindu Law, where in the conflict of evidence, onus is often the determining factor. It is not, however, a subject which is easy of generalization. And it has created a considerable conflict of views, as noticed by the Privy Council, who said: "The conflict of authorities cited to the Board is a conflict which occurs, not merely between the courts of one district in India and another, but also between decisions pronounced in Calcutta itself, in Allahabad itself, and in Madras itself." (1) This was clearly apparent to the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court who had to consider the question of onus. (2) The ensuing sections enunciate a few leading principles on the subject, and they are practically all upon which the reports are more or less agreed. On other points they teem with conflicting cases, which have been relegated to the notes.

114. A debt is a pecuniary obligation arising out of a contract express or implied, or from a breach of civil duty.

Debt defined.

1289. Analogous Law.—The term debt (Rin) is used in Hindu Law in its primary sense as denoting a loan, that is, a liquidated money obligation arising out of contract and recoverable by suit. (3) But the texts show that the contract might be express or implied: "What has been spent for the household by a pupil, apprentice, slave, woman, menial, or agent, must be paid by the head of the household." (4) But modern law classes as debt other obligations ex contractu though they are not strictly within the comprehension of the archaic law. It is not proposed to discuss these in detail in this work which is confined to Hindu Law, especially as they have been already so discussed elsewhere by the present writer. (5) It may, however, be added that the term no longer retains its primitive import and has begun to be used in the sense in which it is understood in the secular law. So a decree for pre-emption obtained by the father has been held to be a debt. "A pre-emptive decree provides that the decree-holder shall acquire the property therein mentioned provided he pays the purchase money within a time fixed. If he does not do so, his suit is to be dismissed with costs. It is very hard to say that such a decree with the liability that is attached to it is not a debt." (1) Consequently, where a Hindu father mortgages joint property for complying with a pre-emption decree, his mortgage was held binding on the son as being for the payment of an antecedent debt.

1290. The Calcutta Court would go even much further. The father had illegally obstructed the watercourse of another who obtained a decree for damages. The father died, and the court held the decree executable against the son, on the ground that the decree constituted the judgment debt for which the son was liable. (2) It was contended that damages awarded for the father's tortious act could not be construed to be the "debt" for which alone the son was liable. But the court overruled the contention holding that a right to damages might be deemed to create a debt even before the suit is brought for its recovery, and that in any case, after decree it was a judgment debt.

But this is probably the extreme verge to which the term can be legitimately extended. As will be shown in the sequel, it does not apply to damages and fines paid or inflicted for the commission of criminal offences

115. The husband and wife are not liable for the debts contracted by each other except in the following cases :—

(a) Where they were contracted by one as the agent of the other.

(b) Where they were contracted for household necessities.

Texts.

1291. Analogous law.—The sacred texts on the subject of this section are in harmony with the present law :—

Narad:—16. The wife must not pay a debt contracted by her husband, nor one contracted by her son, except if it had been promised by her, or contracted in common with her husband.

18. A debt contracted by the wife shall never bind the husband, unless it had been contracted at a time when the husband was in distress. Household expenses are indispensably necessary. (3)

Vishnu:—A debt contracted by the wife, for the purpose of saving from distress her husband, son, daughter, or other family members, must be discharged by the family head. (4)

It has already been stated that as regards their property, both the husband and the wife are absolutely free. The husband cannot, except perhaps in a case of great distress, use his wife's Stridhan. Equally the wife has no right to use her husband's property. But since in the management of the household, one must at times act for the other, it follows that each may incur debts in circumstances when the other would become legally liable to discharge.

The liability depends upon agency. So where the wife alone executed a mortgage deed to secure a debt due from both husband and wife and the husband by his conduct ratified or acquiesced in the mortgage, the wife was deemed to have acted as her husband's agent.<sup>(1)</sup>

The husband is not liable for sums misappropriated by the wife, though he approved of her taking service.<sup>(2)</sup>

1292. Such agency would be implied in purchases made by the wife for household necessities suitable to his situation in life and position. Where goods were purchased by the wife from the plaintiff's firm up to a limit fixed by the husband, he was entitled to repudiate his wife's purchases made in excess secretly and with the plaintiff's connivance.<sup>(3)</sup>

116. (1) A co-parcener is liable to pay his own debts personally and out of his separate property or co-parcenary interest so long as he is alive but on his death it cannot be recovered out of his co-parcenary interest unless it was attached during his life-time.

(2) Provided that where the debt was due from the father and is not illegal or immoral, both his son and grandson are, on his death, liable to pay it to the extent of the assets inherited by them from the father or the grandfather.

1293. Analogous Law.—This section refers only to the personal debts of the co-parcener or the father or grandfather. It does not refer to the debts of the joint family whether incurred by the manager, or the co-parceners jointly.

Clause (1) is the outcome of the decided cases already mentioned (§§ 1245-1252) while clause (2) is supported both by the texts and the cases set out under S. 107.

1294. Co-parcener's debts.—The co-parcener is personally liable for his own debts. The fact that he is a co-parcener does not, of course, clothe him with any special immunity. His separate property is equally liable. It is only when the creditor is unable to recover out of his person and separate property that his right of recovery comes in conflict with the law of co-parcenary. It is no hardship to him that his rights are then limited since he must be presumed to know the law to which co-parcenary interests are subject. These were at one time the subject of much uncertainty. But the courts are now agreed what they are in each case. In a Mitakshara family subject to the courts in Calcutta, Patna, Allahabad, Lucknow and Lahore, a co-parcenary interest is untransferable. In the Central Provinces, Bombay and Madras it is transferable for value, but cannot be transferred by gift or devise. In Bengal which is subject to the Dayabhag law a co-parcener possesses unlimited right of transfer and devise.

1295. Leaving Bengal out of consideration for the present, the co-parcener in the rest of India possesses only a qualified right of transfer. In Bombay, Madras and the Central Provinces he can transfer for value. Consequently, he is competent to mortgage his undivided interest, and the mortgagee is entitled to foreclose or sell it on foot of his mortgage. But since neither foreclosure nor sale can place him in possession of any specific property, all that he can so obtain is the right, title and interest of his mortgagor, that is a right to enforce a partition. <sup>(1)</sup> But until partition he has no greater rights than his mortgagor. He cannot claim profits, <sup>(2)</sup> or disturb the undivided status. <sup>(3)</sup> So far all the courts outside Bengal agree. But there the agreement ends. In Bombay, Madras and the Central Provinces, where <sup>(4)</sup> the co-parcener has the right of transfer for value, the mortgage creates a right in rem, and as such, the mortgagee has a priority over a money creditor who subsequently attaches the same interest in execution of his decree. But though the mortgagee acquires an interest in rem in his mortgagor's interest, he does not acquire an interest in any specific property, though as to this, he has an equity to that property which he can press upon the court in a suit for partition. <sup>(5)</sup>

1296. But in Behar, the United Provinces, Oudh and the Punjab where a co-parcener is incompetent to transfer his co-parcenary interest, a mortgage by a co-parcener conveys no right in rem, and as such, it is indistinguishable from a simple money bond. The creditor's remedy in such cases is to sue on the mortgage or on the bond, and attach the debtor's interest in the joint property. He then acquires an equity to recover his debt out of his debtor's interest by bringing it to sale in execution of his decree. <sup>(6)</sup>

But if the debtor dies before the creditor or succeeds in attaching his interest, then except in the case of the son and the grandson, his interest passes to his other relations by survivorship, and the creditor has no interest of the debtor left, from which he may recover his debt. <sup>(7)</sup> In one case the Calcutta High Court was, however, of opinion that the purchaser's equity is not lost even if his debtor dies after the institution of his suit but before attachment. <sup>(8)</sup>

1297. Father's debt.—The second clause states the rule of Hindu Law which creates a special liability on the son and the grand son to pay his father's and grandfather's personal debts not shown to have been incurred for illegal and immoral purposes. This liability is of course, independent of whether the father and the grandfather was or was not the manager of the family. It is a liability created by the texts and may be enforced even against the manager if he is his son. The question of necessity or benefit to the family as well as their antecedent character are all immaterial, provided only they were not illegal or immoral. (1) As previously stated (§ 1203) the textual liability which was unlimited is now limited to the property inherited by them from that ancestor. Neither the son nor the grandson is liable to discharge the debt out of his separate property. If he was joint with the father, his liability is limited to the extent of his co-parcenary interest which might be seized on the father's death, though it cannot be seized during his life-time, for he is not liable for the debt during his father's lifetime (except where the father has abandoned worldly affairs or is absent for a period raising a presumption of his death). (2) Nor is he liable after his death unless, he has inherited to him, in which case his liability is limited to the extent of the property which he has so inherited. As the son and the grandson are liable, they cannot object to the attachment of their ancestor's interest after his death. The only case in which they may object to the attachment is when they repudiate their liability on the ground that the debts were tainted with illegality or immorality. In any other case the creditor is at liberty to proceed not only against the father's interest but also against that of his son and grandson in the co-parcenary property. (3)

1298. But as has been pointed out before, the liability of the son to pay his father's debt is not co-extensive with the father's right to alien the joint property. (4) In other words, the fact that the creditor may seize the co-parcenary estate for the payment of the father's debts does not justify the father in alienating it for the same purpose.

The subject of alienation will be more fully discussed in the next chapter.

1299. But since a co-parcener is entitled to transfer his interest for value and such transfer by a Mitakshara co-parcener in the north, raises an equity in favour of the transferee, it follows that even if the debt of the father was illegal or immoral, the creditor is entitled to obtain satisfaction from the co-parcenary interest of the father. It may then be that where the character of the debt is determined after the sale, it will determine the quantum of interest available to the purchaser. (5) And similarly where the father executes a mortgage of his right and share in certain villages, the quantum of interest available to the mortgagee must depend upon the character of the debt. If it was such as bound the joint family, all the interest which they possess in the property would pass, but the father's interest would pass in any case. (6)

Father's illegal and immoral debt.

1300. Evidence of illegality or immorality.—It is now settled by the Privy Council that the question of burden of proof must

 (1) Burden of proof. depend upon whether the property has or has not passed out of the family by an alienation made by the father. If it has, then the son suing to dispossess the alienee must shew why he is not bound by the father's alienation. If it has not and the creditor sues for the recovery of money or the enforcement of a mortgage executed by the father, then it is upon him to shew what right he has to sue the son for repayment of the debt of the father. (1)

1301. It is also a well settled rule, that where it is alleged by the sons that a particular debt was contracted by the father for an illegal or immoral purpose, the burden lies upon them to show that it was contracted for such purpose. Such burden is not discharged by proof that the father lived an extravagant or immoral life. It must be proved that the debt in question had been contracted for such purpose. (2) A mere general evidence adduced to show that the father used to attend nautches, and that he occasionally gave nautches at his own expense is no proof of immorality at all, much less of any specific act of immorality upon which the son might claim freedom from the debt. (3) Where however, the court found that the father was generally of dissolute habits and had squandered a large fortune thereon and commenced to borrow large sums, though his ordinary income was ample to meet his usual requirements the court held that the creditor advancing him loans was at least bound to enquire into their purpose, and his failure to make any enquiry coupled with the general dissolute habits of the borrower might be sufficient ground for the court to hold that the loans were made for an immoral purpose. (4) This was the line of ratiocination adopted in another case in which it was argued "that although the creditor would have been justified in advancing the money if he had made such inquiry as was open to him and had satisfied himself as well as he could as to the existence of the necessity, he did not in this case make such inquiry; or rather perhaps, his words may be taken to mean that the result of any enquiry must have shown him quite clearly that the only necessity of Adit Sahai was his own improper and immoral way of life, which caused the expenditure of funds not derivable from his regular income." (5) But these remarks were made with reference to one who had acted as the family banker for a long time previous and must necessarily have been acquainted with the debtor's circumstances and way of life.

1302. Father's imprudent debts.—According to the text, the son is not liable to pay his father's "avyavharic" debt. What is then such a debt? The term has been explained to mean "unusual" or "those not sanctioned by usage or current custom." Mr. Colebrooke translates the word to mean "as repugnant to good morals" and it is said that the word would include such debts which are not supportable as valid by legal arguments and on which no right could be established in the creditor's favour in a court of justice, (1) in short, such debts as the court considers unreasonable or improper. Now a debt may be so, without being illegal or immoral. Is the son then not bound to pay it? The question would seem to be one of degree. For instance, while the son is held to be exempt from making good the father's misappropriations, he is held liable to make good the money which the father, as a member of a temple committee had used in a litigation of his own. (2) In one case the court made the son pay for the father's debt incurred in betting over a wrestling match (3) but it is submitted, that this was clearly "gambling" within the express words of the text. An agreement may be so improvident as to become illegal by reason of its terms. Such was the father's agreement to pay to his father-in-law, who was his creditor to some extent not ascertained, a sum of Rs. 360 annually during the creditor's life-time and Rs. 1,008 to him perpetually for the use of a temple. The father-in-law assigned his claim to the plaintiff who sued for recovery of the annual dues but the court threw out the claim holding it void because it created a perpetual liability on the debtor. (4)

1303. Debt partially valid.—Where the father's debt is partially valid the son is only liable to that extent (5) And it may be that where the co-parceners are sued, the sons may be saddled with a greater liability than the other relations because of their filial obligation.

1304. Father's power over ancestral moveables.—Though the Mitakshara recognizes the father's powers to dispose of ancestral moveables "for indispensable acts of duty, and for purposes prescribed by texts of law, as gifts through affection, support of the family, relief from distress and so forth," (6) such power is necessarily limited and subject to what is now designated legal necessity, (7) apart from which he has no greater power over moveable property than he possesses over immoveable property; though as a matter of practice the court will not so narrowly canvass the purpose if the alienation is made only out of the income of joint property as when it is made out of the corpus. (8) But this is scarcely an exception to the rule, since the power to make appropriate gifts is an incident of ordinary management and is not exclusively possessed by the father. The rule then remains that the father has no greater power of disposal over ancestral moveables than he has over immoveables, (9) though the contrary was at one time maintained by the text writers cited with apparent approval by the Privy Council (10) It was so held by a Full Bench of the Madras

High Court who summed up the result of their examination of the textual passage as follows : "The effect of the several passages taken together is that, while the ownership of the son is recognized in all property, whether the self-acquired property of his father or ancestral, the father has power to dispose at his pleasure, of his self-acquired moveables ; and with a consent, which his son must give, of his self-acquired immovables, he has the power to dispose of ancestral moveables for purposes inculcated by sacred texts, and of all property for indispensable acts of duty ; but the son may interdict him if he applies ancestral wealth, whether moveable or immoveable, to purposes other than those sanctioned." (1)

1305. Burden of proof.—Where the creditor proves that the debt was incurred by the father the son is prima facie liable by reason of his pious obligation to discharge his father's debts and it is then upon him to prove that the debt was such for which he could not be made legally liable. (2) In this respect a distinction is to be made between a suit to recover the father's debts and one to enforce a mortgage or any other transfer effected by him. The two cases stand on quite a different footing, since in an ordinary money suit instituted by the creditor to recover his debt advanced to the father, the creditor may rest his case on the pious obligation of the son. But the case is different where the father has charged or alienated the joint estate for a debt of his own. In such a case, as already seen, the question of burden of proof depends upon whether the property has or has not passed out of the family. If it has, then he who sues to recover it must impeach the transfer, otherwise he cannot recover. If it is still in the family and the creditor sues to enforce the charge it is upon him to show that the debt was such as entitled the father to charge the interest of his son with his own. (3)

Liability to pay interest.

1306. The liability to pay a debt involves a liability to pay interest. (4) In the case of the son the liability is undoubted, but in the case of the grandson, the text provides as follows :—

Brihaspati :—The father's debt on being proved must be paid by the sons as if it were their own ; the grandfather's debt must be paid by his son's son without interest ; but the son of grandson need not pay it at all. (5)

It has been held that this provision does not affect secured debts which are payable out of the property. (6) And the rule was no doubt literally enforced in a case decided in 1865 in which the grandson was held liable to pay his grandfather's debt without interest, independently of any inherited assets (7) but this unqualified liability was removed by a local act passed in the following year. (8)

In another case a decree for mesne profits obtained against the father and the grandfather was sought to be executed against the grandson who claimed exemption from payment of interest on the strength of Hindu Law, but the court appears to have conceded the rule, though it held the grandson liable on the ground that the decree he had to satisfy was passed for the wrongful act of both. (1)

It may perhaps be added that the Hindu Law prescribes a rule of liability independent of the assets, and now that it has been limited to assets, there is no reason why a further limitation detached from the context should be sanctioned to limit the liability of the grandson.

1307. Position of the assignee.—Assuming that the father's debt was irrecoverable out of the son by reason of its illegality or immorality, the next question that arises is what is the position of the assignee of the debt or of the decree passed against the father. Has he any equity superior to that of the son? The question was considered by the Privy Council who have held that the assignee of the debt or of the money decree is bound to enquire as to the character of the father's liability and that he must be deemed to have had notice of the illegality or immorality of the debt if he could have ascertained it by enquiry. (2) Where however the father mortgages the joint property for such debt whereupon a decree is passed, the purchaser stands upon surer ground, for he need not then enquire that the property sold to him was liable to satisfy the decree. But it is still open to the son to show that he had notice. (3) In other words, the question about the equity between the son and the father's assignee depends not so much upon the nature of the transaction, as upon his bona fides and notice. If the assignee is an assignee of the mere debt or decree and no property has passed out of the family to the purchaser, then the assignee takes subject to the same equity to which his assignor was subject. But if on the other hand, in pursuance of such a decree or otherwise by contract or sale, the joint property had gone out of the family to a purchaser, then the son cannot recover it from him by mere proof that the consideration for the transfer was tainted with illegality or immorality unless he further shews that the purchaser had taken it in good faith and with notice. (4)

1308. Limitation.—The limitation for a suit against the son for recovery of an unsecured debt of his father is six years from the date of the accrual of cause of action against the son, which was at one time held to be the father's death, (5) but it has been since pointed out that the cause of action against the son is not different from that against the father, and that the cause of action against one is consequently the cause of action against the other. (6) This may be the death of the father, but it is not invariably so where for instance, the father as agent of his employer, withdrew money from the chest of his principal from time to time and placed it in the chest of his own estate, doing so up to the day of his death and there was no adjustment of accounts. In a suit for the sums so withdrawn by the principal against the son and grandson, limitation was held to start from the death of the father and the period of limitation was held to be 6 years as prescribed in Art. 120 of the Limitation Act. (1) The same view was taken by a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court who had to decide the question whether a suit against the son on a mortgage effected by the father for a debt not binding on the family was governed by Art. 120 or Art. 132. It was held that as the mortgage was not binding on the son who was however only liable because of his pious obligation, the suit against him was subject to Art. 120 which allowed the creditor six years from the date when the cause of action accrues. (2) Now this may accrue either (i)—when the debt incurred by the father matures, (ii)—when the creditor after exhausting his remedies against the father, finds that the debt or a portion thereof is still unsatisfied, or (iii)—the date of the death of the father. The Full Bench refused to decide the terminus a quo but in an earlier case limitation was held to run from the first of these dates. (3)

117. (1) The son's liability to pay his father's debt is limited to the assets inherited by him from his father.

1309. Analogous Law.—It is now settled that the son's liability to pay his father's debt is limited to the estate inherited by him from his father or to his succeeding to the joint estate in which he and his father were co-parceners. It is however, immaterial whether the estate inherited from his father was the latter's ancestral or self-acquired property. As observed by the Privy Council, "the freedom of the son from the obligation to discharge the father's debt has, respect not to the nature of the estate, whether ancestral or acquired, by the creator of the debt." (4) Consequently, unless he can show that the debt for which he is made liable was incurred by the father for illegal or immoral purposes, he cannot escape liability from payment to the extent of the joint property he has received by survivorship, or of any other property which he may have inherited from his father.

The same liability and to the same extent extends to the grandson.

1310. Inherited assets.—The inherited assets in the hands of the son which is the measure of the latter's liability means all the joint property including the son's interest therein (5) and not merely the father's interest or his separate or self-acquired property.

Not liable after separation.

118. The son is not liable to pay his father's debts incurred after his separation.

1311. Analogous Law.—On separation the son ceases to be a member of the joint family, and as his liability depends upon receipt of assets after the debt, it follows that the son who has already received his heritage can no longer be compelled to discharge his pious obligation in respect of debts incurred by the father after his separation. <sup>(1)</sup> He is however liable for debts incurred before partition. <sup>(2)</sup>

The son will, of course, be liable if the partition was unreal and made with intent to defeat the father's creditors. <sup>(3)</sup>

When the son is personally liable

119. (1) The father's debt is not a charge upon the inheritance.

(2) But as heir, the son becomes personally liable to pay the father's debt if he has alienated the inherited property, otherwise than in due course of administration, with the intention of avoiding his liability.

1312. Analogous Law.—The principle underlying this section is obvious and has been enacted as S. 2 of the Bombay Hindu Heirs Relief Act, 1866 <sup>(4)</sup> and S. 53 of the Code of Civil Procedure <sup>(5)</sup> and is enunciated in several cases. <sup>(6)</sup>

The creditor's remedy against the son and heir is supplementary to that he may have against his transferee. <sup>(7)</sup>

The son or heir is only personally liable if he is guilty of fraud. If the heir has in due course of administration disposed of the father's property, his liability is at an end. Such may be the case where the debts exceeded the assets which are utilized to discharge some of the father's liabilities.

1314. But though the liability of the son arises on the father's death the cause of action against the son is not independent of the father and a decree against the latter may be executed against the former out of the property which he has inherited from him or his grandfather, it being open to him to raise any objection or defence in such proceedings which he might have raised in a separate suit. <sup>(1)</sup> This procedure is now sanctioned by the Code of 1908, prior to which the courts were divided on the competency of the creditor to execute against the son a money decree obtained against the father if he be dead before the issue of execution. In the view of the Allahabad <sup>(2)</sup> and Madras <sup>(3)</sup> High Courts, the ancestral property in the hands of the son or the grandson could not be seized in execution of a decree against the father even to the extent of the father's interest therein if the father died before the attachment <sup>(4)</sup> and the only remedy of the decree-holder was to institute a regular suit against the son or grandson. According to some cases of the Calcutta <sup>(5)</sup> and Bombay <sup>(6)</sup> courts however, there was no necessity for a regular suit even if the father died after the decree but before the attachment, and this view has now been confirmed even by the legislature. <sup>(7)</sup>

1315. It is immaterial whether the decree against the father or the manager is a money or a mortgage decree, since a mortgage decree is executable against a successor of the judgment debtor even when he holds the property by survivorship under the Mitakshara law, without bringing a suit for declaration that the property in his hands is liable to be sold in execution of the mortgage decree. It is open to the successor to take the very defences in execution proceedings which he might take in a separate suit. <sup>(8)</sup>

But the same rule cannot be extended to other co-parceners who succeed to the judgment debtor's estate by survivorship, <sup>(9)</sup> nor even to the sons where the decree is limited to the personal assets of the father. <sup>(10)</sup>

1316. Analogous Law.—It is a well known principle of equity that he who receives the benefit must also bear the burden. And under Hindu Law the heir is expressly made liable for the debts of his predecessor (1) as declared in the following texts:—

Narad:—17. A sonless widow, and one who has been enjoined by her dying husband to pay his debts must pay it—or (it must be paid) by him who inherits the estate (For) the liability for the debts goes together with the right of succession (2)

Vishnu:—A widowed woman who has no son is bound to pay the debt of her husband, if he has commissioned her to do so on his deathbed, or if his property has escheated to her. If she is unfit to take the estate, her husband's debt must be re-paid by those who have inherited the estate. The property and the liabilities go together (3)

Yajnavalkya.—He who has received the estate or the wife of the deceased should be made to pay his debts, or failing either, the son who has not received an inheritance. In the case of a sonless deceased those who take the heritage should be made to pay (4)

1317. Impartible estate.—It is now settled that an impartible estate cannot be the subject of co-parcenary rights of succession by survivorship. (5) The holder for the time being is its absolute owner, and in this respect he occupies the same position in regard to his estate as the Dayabhag father does in regard to his co-parcenary estate. On the death of both, the heir becomes liable to pay all his debts irrespective of their origin and purpose if they are within time. (6) The successor of an impartible holder is his heir, and as such, he takes the estate subject to his pecuniary obligations. Between him and his successor there is the privity of estate, and as such the heir is liable to pay the holder's debts which could have been recovered out of his estate if he were alive. (7) As between the sons of a Zemindar, his impartible estate and his other property not being regalia, which is partible, should contribute in proportion to their value to the discharge of his debt. (8)

1318. Husband's debts.—The widow is under the same pious obligation to pay her husband's debts as the son is to pay those of his father. But her liability is even greater since she is bound to pay his debts whether immoral or illegal, if the creditor was not an accessory, and she is entitled though not bound to pay them even if they be barred by time. (9) As in the case of the son so in her case the obligation arises only on the death of her husband. (10) Any payment made by her during his life-time would be a voluntary payment and will not support an alienation of her husband's estate which she inherits on his death. (11) The widow inherits her husband's estate after payment of her husband's debts. All debts which would bind the husband personally are necessarily binding upon the widow in respect of all the assets which have come to her hands as his legal representative. A debt incurred by a person as surety is binding as a family-debt upon his undivided son, and a fortiori his wife cannot impugn such debt. Where therefore, in execution of a decree obtained by the creditor against his debtor in respect of an obligation incurred by the latter as surety, the decree-holder attached a house and brought it himself in court auction and applied to be placed in possession and the debtor's representative, the widow claimed, that she had a right of residence and that she should not be ejected, it was held that the widow had no right to residence in priority to the right of her husband's creditors to be paid out of assets and to realize their dues out of the estate if not paid, and that the surety debt was a family-debt which would bind the widow and defeat her right of maintenance including her right of residence. (1) The husband's debts recoverable from his widow may be set off against any debt due to her. (2)

1319. The trade debts properly incurred by a Hindu widow on the credit of the assets of the business to which she has succeeded as the heiress of her deceased husband are recoverable after her death out of the assets of the business as against the reversioners who succeed thereto, even in the absence of a specific charge. (3)

1320. Other heirs.—A Hindu inheriting property from his mother is liable for debts to the extent of the property inherited. (4)

1321. Liability of donees.—The principle that the heir is liable to pay his predecessor's debts is recognized in S. 126 of the Transfer of Property Act which enacts as follows :—

S. 128. Subject to the provisions of S. 127 where a gift consists of the donor's whole property the donee is personally liable for all the debts due by the donor at the time of the gift to the extent of the property comprised therein.

S. 127 enacts that where the gift is burdened by an obligation the donee can take nothing by the gift unless he accepts it fully. Where however, a gift is in the form of two or more separate and independent transfers to the same person of several things, the donee is at liberty to accept one of them and refuse the others, although the former may be beneficial and the latter onerous.

A donee not competent to contract and accepting property burdened by an obligation is not bound by his acceptance. But if, after becoming competent to contract and being aware of the obligation, he retains the property given he becomes so bound.

But this does not mean that the gift is not complete the moment it is accepted. All it means is that the minor on attaining majority, is privileged to disaffirm his acceptance, if he finds it too onerous. Consequently where the minor dies before attaining his majority the gift remains, though his personal privilege is gone. (5) These provisions do not of their own force apply to Hindus, but they enact an equitable rule which is entirely consonant with Hindu Law. So where the testator devised the whole of his property to his 121. Where the manager or the heir contracts a debt or transfers property for consideration, alleging the existence of justifying necessity or benefit, it will as between the creditor or the transferee on the one part, and the manager or the heir and other persons (if any) affected by the debt or the transfer, on the other part, be deemed to have existed, if the creditor or transferee as the case may be, after using reasonable care to ascertain the existence of such circumstances, has acted in good faith.

The same rule extends to the father contracting a debt or transferring property in consideration of an antecedent debt.

benefit to be conferred upon it, in the particular instance, is the thing to be regarded. But of course, if that danger arises or has arisen from any misconduct to which the lender is or has been a party, he cannot take advantage of his own wrong, to support a charge in his own favour against the heir, grounded on a necessity which his wrong has helped to cause. Therefore, the lender in this case unless he is shown to have acted mala fide will not be affected, though it be shown that, with better management, the estate might have been kept free from debt. Their Lordships think that the lender is bound to enquire into the necessities for the loan, and to satisfy himself as well as he can, with reference to the parties with whom he is dealing, that the manager is acting in the particular instance for the benefit of the estate. But they think that if he does so inquire, and acts honestly, the real existence of an alleged sufficient and reasonably credited necessity is not a condition precedent to the validity of his charge, and they do not think that under such circumstances, he is bound to see to the application of the money. It is obvious that money to be secured on any estate is likely to be obtained on easier terms than a loan which rests on mere personal security, and that, therefore, the mere creation of a charge for a proper debt cannot be viewed as improvident management: the purposes for which a loan is wanted are often future, as respects the actual application, and a lender can rarely have, unless he enters on the management, the means of controlling and rightly directing the actual application. Their Lordships do not think that a bona fide creditor should suffer when he has acted honestly and with due caution but is himself deceived." (1)

1323. Creditor's or alienee's title.—The creditor or alienee dealing with the manager of a joint family knows that he is dealing with its representative whose authority to charge the joint property is limited. Consequently, if he advances money without enquiry into the purpose of the loan he takes the risk. If his loan was in fact advanced for a purpose binding on the joint family, then he of course, runs no risk. But if, on the other hand, the manager had falsely pledged the credit of the family, then the creditor can recover nothing beyond what represents the manager's interest in the joint property, for the manager being the immediate party to the contract, cannot repudiate his own liability. For the same reason, where he chooses to deal with all the members of the joint family, then they are all bound and the question of enquiry is immaterial.

1324. Inquiry is only necessary when the creditor deals with the manager as such, and he is anxious to safeguard his interests against the manager's misrepresentation as to the necessity for the loan. It may be that the object of the loan is legal but it does not thence follow that the loan itself was necessary. For it is not thereby necessary that the loan should be for a lawful purpose. It is perhaps even more necessary that it should be necessary. This was emphasized by the Privy Council in the passage already cited from the leading case, in which they observed: "The actual pressure on the estate, the danger to be averted, or the benefit to be conferred upon it in the particular instance, is the thing to be regarded". (2) In other words, the manager is not entitled to borrow money for a lawful purpose, but only if it is necessary. In what circumstances it is so necessary must depend upon the circumstances of each case. The income received from the estate, its normal expenditure and the savings made are all matters which a prudent lender is bound to enquire about. If he does so enquire and finds that the manager has been mismanaging the estate, and that with better management the loan might have been wholly unnecessary, he is on that account to refuse the loan, even if it is justified by the pressure of the moment. It will thus be seen that as a measure of caution it is always prudent to enquire, and the lender who omits this precaution, hazards his money which he may never see again.

1325. Nature and extent of inquiry.—Assuming however, that the lender does inquire, the next question that arises is what should be the nature and extent of the inquiry. It is obvious that, such inquiry must be made from one who is in a position to know. It is equally obvious that it must be made from an independent source, and not from one who is interested in upholding the manager. The question must of course, depend upon the facts of each case, the nature of the necessity, and the avenues of information available to the lender. He is not bound to sit in a star chamber but at the same time he owes a duty to himself and to his absent obligors whose estate he seeks to bind, that he should conduct his inquiry in a prudent and business-like way.

1326. Where the joint family comprises adult members, common prudence dictates that he should consult them all or at least such as are accessible to him. If some of them be minors, their guardians should be consulted. If the borrower is the widow, her reversioners are the persons to inquire from; if the father, the sons should be consulted. In short, the lender must take pains to consult those whose interest would be affected by his act. Where all co-parceners advise the loan the creditor need not do more. His difficulty only arises when any or some of them are minors. He has then to be more circumspect. He must inquire into the purpose of the loan. If, for instance, any amount is due from the joint family for purposes mentioned in S. 96 or 97, or from the father for his antecedent loan, it is his duty to inquire from those best qualified to supply him with correct information. (1)

1327. In this connection it is well to note that the lender is deemed to have notice of a fact not only when he actually knows that fact, but also "when but for wilful abstention from an inquiry or search which he ought to have made, or gross negligence, he would have known it, or when information of the fact is given to, or obtained by his agent under circumstances mentioned in the Indian Contract Act, 1878, S. 229." (2)

1328. Value of recitals.—The results of the inquiry are often recited in the lender's security. The question arises what evidentiary value have these recitals. In the leading Privy Council case it was said: "that the representations by the manager accompanying the loan as part of the res gestæ and as the contemporaneous declarations of an agent, though not actually selected by the principal, have been held to be evidence against the heir." (3) But though admissible, they are not of themselves without other independent evidence, when available, sufficient to constitute proof of their truth, though when other evidence has, through lapse of time, become unobtainable, then they would be sufficient proof of the fact they state. The true value of recitals has been explained by the Privy Council with reference to a deed executed by a widow, to be as follows: "In general terms the facts recited would establish the necessity alleged, but it is well established that such recitals cannot by themselves be relied upon for the purpose of proving the assertions of fact which they contain. Indeed, it is obvious that if such proof were permitted, the rights of reversioners could always be defeated by the insertion of carefully prepared recitals. Under ordinary circumstances and apart from statute, recitals in deeds can only be evidence as between the parties to the conveyance and those who claim under them. But in such a case as the present their Lordships do not think that that these recitals can be disregarded, nor, on the other hand, can any fixed and inflexible rule be laid down as to the proper weight which they are entitled to receive. If the deeds were challenged at the time or near the date of their execution, so that independent evidence would be available, the recitals would deserve but slight consideration, and certainly should not be accepted as proof of the facts. But as time goes by, and all the original parties to the transaction and all those who could have given evidence on the relevant points have grown old or passed away, a recital consistent with the probability and circumstances of the case assumes greater importance, and cannot legally be set aside; for it should be remembered that the actual proof of the necessity which justified the deed is not essential to its validity. It is only necessary that a representation should have been made to the purchaser that such necessity existed, and that he should have acted honestly and made proper enquiry to satisfy himself of its truth. The recital is clear evidence of the representation, and, if the circumstances are such as to justify a reasonable belief that an enquiry would have confirmed its truth, then when proof of actual enquiry has become impossible, the recital, coupled with such circumstances, would be sufficient to support the deed. To hold otherwise would result in deciding that a title becomes weaker as it grows older, so that a transaction, perfectly honest and legitimate when it took place, would ultimately be incapable of justification merely owing to the passage of time."<sup>(1)</sup>

And the contrary might be proved by calling in the scribe or other attesting witnesses.

1329. Similarly, it is usual in this country to obtain the attestation of persons whom the obligee intends to bind by the deed.

Attestation But a different rule has come into vogue in accordance with the practice of the English courts, where an attesting witness is not presumed to know anything of the contents of the deed and is not consequently estopped by its recitals.<sup>(2)</sup> This is a natural presumption due to the habits of the people where the attesting witnesses ordinarily, know nothing of the deed. But the very contrary should be presumed here when no one outside the Anglicized Indians, would ever dream of signing a deed without knowing all about it. In fact no document is ever penned in this country which is not discussed by the scribe, the attesting witnesses and the junto of quidnuncs who surround such transactions. The presumption of law here should certainly be that the attesting witnesses knew its contents. But as it is, the contrary has been laid down by English Judges who have presumed their own social habits as equally applicable to the people of India. However, it is only a presumption.

1330. The quantum of evidence necessary to support the justifying necessity must of course vary according to the circumstances of each case. As the Privy Council observed: "It is obvious, however, that it might be unreasonable to require such proof from one not an original party, after a lapse of time and enjoyment and apparent acquiescence; consequently, if, as is the case here, as to part of the charge, it be created by substitution of a new security for an older one, where the consideration for the older one was an old precedent debt of an ancestor not previously questioned, a presumption of the kind contended for by the appellant would be reasonable." (1)

1331. Excessive alienation.—It has already been stated, and is so held by the Privy Council that, granted the legal necessity for a loan, it is more advantageous to borrow money on a mortgage than on parol, since money on mortgage being better secured ordinarily carries a lower rate of interest. Again even the raising of money on a mortgage might be an imprudent act if there is no prospect of its repayment. In that case a sale might be justified, though since sale is the permanent alienation of the joint property, only so much of it should be sold as would suffice to meet the necessity. But this rule does not apply where the excess is small or where the money really required cannot otherwise be raised. (2)

122. Where a transfer by the manager is found to be void its effect upon the interest of the transferor is subject to the following rules:—

(1) Where the transfer was voluntarily made by the manager subject to the Mitakshara law as applied in Behar, the United Provinces, Oudh and the Punjab, it is wholly void, subject however to such restitution and compensation to the transferee as the requirements of equity may demand.

(2) Where however, in the provinces last mentioned, the transfer is involuntary, and in all other provinces whether it is voluntary or otherwise, on the transfer being found void against the joint family, the transferee is entitled to obtain his transferor's interest therein.

(3) Without prejudice to the generality of the rule stated in clause 1, due regard will be had to the following facts:—

(1) The representation made by the transferor as to the necessity of the sale.

(2) The enquiries, if any, made by the purchaser into the same.

(3) Improvements made by him.

(4) The fact that unconditional rescission of the sale will benefit the transferor.

joint family for his own personal benefit without the consent of the nephews and without legal necessity. The nephew sued for cancellation of the sale, which the trial judge refused, but the other courts in India decreed. On appeal to the Privy Council it was contended that the purchaser was entitled to an equitable charge in his favour for the consideration of Rs. 10,000 paid to the uncle. But the Privy Council held that since the death of the uncle, his share passed by survivorship to the nephew, and there was no pious obligation upon the latter to pay the debts of the former, and since the uncle was dead and could not profit by his nephew's action, the purchaser had no equity which he could enforce on the death of his vendor. "It might have been quite consistent with equitable principles to refuse to Zalim, (the uncle) restitution of the interest which he sold, except on condition of its being made at once available for repayment of the price which he received. But the respondent (the nephew) is not affected by any equity of that kind. He took in his own right by survivorship and is not liable for the personal debts and obligations of his uncle Zalim; and it appears to their Lordships, that an equity, which might have been enforced against Zalim's interest whilst it existed, cannot be made to affect that interest when it has passed to a surviving co-parcener, except by repealing the rule of the Mitakshara law." (1)

1335. But if in such a case the purchaser had taken time by the forelock and attached the uncle's interest while he was alive, then the purchaser would have acquired an equity which he lost by the death of his transferor. (2) The case, again, would have been different if the uncle had professed to transfer for legal necessity and the purchaser had purchased the property after due inquiry thereinto. So again, his case would have been better if his transferor had been the father in which case the pious obligation of the son to discharge his father's liability would have given the purchaser a stronger claim. (3) But this obligation cannot avail the purchaser during the father's life-time, or on his death, if the claim for its enforcement is barred by time. As Lord Shaw said: "While the father, however, remains in life, the attempt to affect the sons' and grandsons' share in the property in respect merely of their pious obligation to pay off their father's debts, and not in respect of the debt having been truly incurred for the interest of the estate itself, which they with their father jointly own, that attempt must fail; and the simplest of all reasons may be assigned for this, namely that before the father's death he may pay off the debt, or after his death there may be ample personal estate belonging to the father himself out of which the debt may be discharged. In short, responsibility to meet the father's debts is one thing, and the validity of a mortgage over the joint estate is quite another thing. Accordingly, the case founded merely upon pious obligation, and so strenuously argued before the Board fails in the present instance by reason of the fact that Bhup Singh (the father) who contracted the debt, is still alive, and that there is a concurrent finding by both of the courts below to the effect that the plaintiffs have failed to prove that the debt of Rs. 200 for which the mortgage was granted, was incurred for any legal necessity or benefit to the estate." (4)

1336. Then, later on in the same case, they said: "The importance of the case being free from complications is this: that except, under the mortgage, all other remedies have long ago disappeared and the appellants rear it up and claim under it now, there being no right in them to invoke the doctrine of the pious obligation to discharge the debt incurred by Bhup Singh because that debt, as such, cannot be successfully sued for. Accordingly, unless the mortgage validly affects the joint family estate, the appellants must fail." (1) So in another case the same Board set aside the father's mortgage as wholly bad without exempting the father's share on the ground that there were no special circumstances such as those mentioned in Mahabir's case where there had been a representation as to necessity. (2) Without such representation or other equity, the purchaser under the manager's voluntary conveyance cannot claim any right. Any other view would amount to this: "that for every mortgage by the head of a joint family the property of the joint family could be made available to the extent of the interest of the mortgagor," (3) and this would be subversive of the rule established in Upper India that a co-parcenary property cannot be aliened. Of course, where the father has mortgaged (4) or sold (5) the joint family property for his own antecedent debt, the son cannot complain, for the father then has the same right of transfer as any other manager has in the case of necessity or benefit.

These were, however, appeals from Allahabad where a co-parcener is not conceded even the right of alienation of his interest for value. The result would be different in the provinces where such alienation is permitted.

Creditor's suit against the son.

123. (1) The unsecured creditor suing the son for the recovery of his father's debt must prove the debt.

(2) It is then upon the son to prove that the debt was non-existent, or that it was illegal or immoral of which fact the creditor had notice.

(3) The creditor may then show that he had made the loan after reasonable inquiry being satisfied that it was required for a purpose neither illegal or immoral. (6)

Analogous Law.—If regard be had to the fact that (i)—the son is bound to pay all his father's debts excepting only those that are shown to be illegal or immoral, though (ii)—the father has no power to transfer the joint property for such debts, his power being limited to transfers made as provided in S. 108 it will be seen that the burden of proof must necessarily vary according as the creditor is secured or unsecured. In the former case the father having only a limited power of transfer it is for the creditor to show that he had acted within that power. In the latter case the father's debts being prima facie binding on the son, it is upon the latter to prove the exceptional cases of his immunity. If he does so prove, the creditor may then rebut the son's case by shewing that whatever might be the facts, he believed them to be true after due inquiry. In that case, law will give him the same benefit as if the facts had really existed. This view is supported by the principle that where of two persons one must suffer, it must be the one who is more liable.

1338. It is immaterial whether the property inherited by the son was the father's ancestral or self-acquired property, since "by the Hindu Law, the freedom of the son from the obligation to discharge the father's debt has respect to the nature of the debt and not to the estate, whether ancestral or acquired by the contractor of the debt." (1) As however, the filial duty is general and the exemption an exception to the rule, his liability may be established on proof of the debt and it will be then on the son to establish his exemption by showing that the debt was either not antecedent or that it was illegal or immoral. The court presumes the debt to be binding because it presumes that the creditor would not have lent himself to an illegal or immoral transaction. (2) This question was referred to a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court but its reply is not very illuminating, (3) and in other cases the distinction between the father's debt and his transfer appears to have been ignored. (4) For, while it is unquestionable that the son being under the duty to pay his father's debts the creditor suing for money need not prove anything beyond a debt of the father it by no means follows that the son is equally bound by an alienation of his interest made by the father, and that in a creditor's suit for enforcement of the alienation, he is as a matter of course entitled to a decree unless the son shews cause against it.

1339. It is apprehended that in a case of alienation the son is entitled to say, whatever may be his obligation for the payment of a debt, the father could not charge his interest except for limited purposes and that therefore, the transferee occupies no better position than the transferee from any other manager. They must both prove the act to be ultra vires of the transferor.

1340. The only exception that the rule admits of is that in favour of the purchaser who has already taken possession and of the execution purchaser whether he has or has not taken possession. The reasons why they are entitled to greater rights will be seen in the sequel.

1341. It lies on the son or grandson contesting a decree obtained for the father's debt to show that the debt was illegal or immoral. This of course, cannot be proved by general proof of immorality, that the father kept a mistress without establishing any connection between the act and the debt in question. (5) The son is liable to pay his father's debts whether the father was or was not the manager of the joint family. (6)

1342. Analogous Law.—The authority of both the father and the manager being limited as regards the alienation of joint property, the burden of proving that a mortgage executed by them was within their power as representative of the family is necessarily on the mortgagee. (1) The contrary has however, been laid down in cases in which the distinction between the father's right and the son's duty is overlooked. (2) Even in cases in which this distinction was kept in view the court gave currency to the view that the son was not bound by the mortgage without proof of the binding character of the debt which might be recovered, notwithstanding the form of the suit, out of the whole of the ancestral estate inclusive of the mortgaged property. (3)

1343. The question was considered by a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court but the court was divided, though the majority laid the onus on the mortgagee. (4) In support of their view they quoted the following passage from a judgment of the Privy Council. (5) "Thus where the mortgagee himself, with whom the transaction took place, is setting up a charge in his favour made by one whose title to alienate he necessarily knew to be limited and qualified, he may be reasonably expected to allege and prove facts presumably better known to him than to the infant heir, namely, those facts which embody the representations made to him of the alleged needs of the estate and the motives influencing his immediate loan." The same high tribunal in another case reaffirmed the same rule in the following terms: "The mortgagor was the defendant Bhup Singh. The other defendants are his sons and grandsons. Under the Mitakshara law they are, as members of a joint family, co-parceners in the ownership of the property over which the mortgage was granted.

1344. It is well to keep the general principle applicable to such a situation in mind. There have been so many decisions by courts of law on the exception to the principle, that the principle itself has been apt to be forgotten. Under the law of the Mitakshara the joint family property owned, as stated by all members of the family as co-parceners, cannot be the subject of a gift, sale or mortgage by one co-parcener except with the consent, express or implied, of all the other co-parceners. Any deed or gift, sale or mortgage, granted by one co-parcener on his own account or over the joint family property, is invalid; the estate is wholly unaffected by it and its entirety stands free of it.

1346. The law of the Mitakshara has, however, given to the father in his capacity of manager and head of the family certain powers with reference to the joint family property. The general principle with regard to the matter is, that he is at liberty, to effect or to dispose of the joint property in respect of purposes denominated necessary purposes. The principle in regard to this is analogous to that of the power vested in the head of a religious endowment or mutt, or of the guardian of an infant family. In all of the cases where it can be established that the estate itself that is under administration demanded, or the family interests justified, the expenditure, then those entitled to the estate are bound by the transaction. It is not accurate to describe this as either inconsistent with or an exception to the fundamental rule of the Mitakshara. For where estate or family necessity exists, that necessity rests upon the co-parceners as a whole, and it is proper to imply a consent of all of them to that act of the one which such necessity has demanded." (1)

1346. These remarks were of course, made in an appeal from the United Provinces. But the underlying principle is the same in any view of the rights of co-parceners. They are the joint owners of their estate which is managed by one of them who acts as their representative, and who as such possesses certain powers which he can exercise only in case of necessity. The alienee must therefore, prove that such necessity existed or that he was satisfied from inquiry that it did, before he could bind the other co-parceners by an act not their own.

1347. That it must be so in the case of co-parceners admits of no doubt. But is the case of the son any different? It was so argued before the Privy Council who adverting to it said: "It was argued that a mortgage was binding because of an obligation of religion and piety which is placed upon the sons, and grandsons, under the Mitakshara law, to discharge their father's debts. If accordingly he has incurred a debt, and the debt was not for immoral purposes, the pious obligation resting upon the sons and grandsons to discharge this debt is in practice worked out by giving effect to any mortgage or sale of the family property, in which they, with the father, its manager, were joint owners, so as to enable the debt to be discharged." But they added: "Responsibility to meet the father's debt is one thing, and the validity of a mortgage over the joint estate is quite another thing." (2)

1348. This case may be taken to have now settled an old controversy about the burden of proof. The case under reference was one of mortgage by the father but the same rule holds equally good where the mortgagor is any other manager.

1349. This case is in consonance with the previous decisions of the same Board (3) in which, however, their pronouncements did not so clearly define the rights and powers of the co-parcenary manager.

125. In a suit instituted to enforce a mortgage executed

by the manager, the other members are proper parties, but their non-joinder does not exempt them from liability, if it appears that they were sufficiently represented by the manager.

1350. Analogous Law.—This section is explanatory of O. 34, R. 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure which requires the joinder in a mortgage suit of all persons interested either in the mortgage security or in the right of redemption. This rule was S. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act, which has been the subject of much conflict of views discussed in another place. <sup>(1)</sup> But whatever conflict there may have been in the past, the view of the Privy Council supports this section, for they say: "There seems, to be no doubt upon the Indian decisions (from which their Lordships see no reason to dissent) that there are occasions, including foreclosure actions when the manager of a joint Hindu family so effectively represents all other members of the family that the family as a whole is bound." <sup>(2)</sup> Their Lordships found that the case before them was one in which there was not the slightest ground for suggesting that the managers had failed to act in the interest of the family and this is the test. In this case the mortgagee had sued the mortgagor and his subsequent mortgagees who were members of a joint family. A decree was passed against them. But as they failed to redeem the prior mortgage, their interests were foreclosed, whereupon the minor members sued for redemption claiming that right on the ground that they should have been impleaded by the prior mortgagee and that his failure to implead them could not imperil their right. But the Privy Council rejected their claim holding that they were sufficiently represented through their manager.

1351. This case then settles the rule here stated. The manager has the authority to sue and be sued in respect of all transactions including mortgages on behalf of the family of which he is the accredited representative and all decrees obtained by or against him are decrees for or against the family.

1352. At the same time should any co-parcener desire that he should be impleaded in a suit, it is always open to the court to join him, as direct representation is in every way preferable.

1354. But the question may sometimes be whether a person sued or was sued as a manager or as a member of the family. This is a question of fact which must be decided with reference to the nature of the claim and the pleadings in each case.

126. (1) It lies on the co-parcener suing for recovery of joint property sold by the manager to prove that the sale was one which by its nature and purpose, did not bind his interest, and that the purchaser had notice of it.

Burden where purchaser is in possession.

(2) In a sale made in execution of a decree obtained against the manager, the court will presume that the purchaser,

1355. Analogous Law.—Joint property may pass out of the family by a voluntary or compulsory sale. Of these the court is especially concerned in protecting the title of the auction purchaser for without such protection no one will purchase at such sales. This was the view taken by the Sadar court who said: "The sales for the reversal of which the present suit is brought divide themselves into three classes: first, sales made by order of court in execution of decrees; second, sales made privately to satisfy decrees and bonds; and third, sales made simply in order to raise money for some purpose or another. Freedom on the part of the son, as far as regards ancestral property, from the obligation to discharge the father's debts under Hindu Law can be successfully pleaded only by a consideration of the invalid nature of the debts incurred. Now we are clearly of opinion that the plaintiff has been unable to show that the expenses for which those decrees were passed looking to the decrees themselves (and we cannot now look beyond these) were immoral, and such as under Hindu Law the son would not be liable for." (1) The Privy Council applied this principle to a case in which the sons had sued their fathers and the latter's alienees under compulsory sales for payment of the family and other necessary debts. They said: "A purchaser under an execution is surely not bound to go back beyond the decree to ascertain whether the court was right in giving the decree or, having given it, in putting up the property for sale under an execution upon it. It has already been shown that, if the decree was a proper one, the interest of the sons, as well as the interest of the fathers, in the property, although it was ancestral, were liable for the payment of the fathers' debts. The purchaser under that execution, it appears to their Lordships, was not bound to go further back than to see that there was a decree against those two gentlemen; that the property was property liable to satisfy the decree, if the decree had been given properly against them; and having inquired into that and having bona fide purchased the estate under the execution and bona fide paid a valuable consideration for the property, the plaintiffs are not entitled to come in, and to set aside all that has been done under the decree and execution, and recover back the estate from the defendant." (2) In a later case this case was held to establish the two following propositions:—

Firstly.—That where joint ancestral property has passed out of a joint family either under a conveyance executed by a father in consideration of an antecedent debt or under a sale in execution of a decree for the father's debts, his sons by reason of their duty to pay their father's debts cannot recover that property, unless they show that the debts were contracted for immoral purposes, and that the purchasers had notice that they were so contracted; and

Secondly.—That the purchasers at an execution sale, being strangers to the suit, if they have not notice that the debts were so contracted, are not bound to make inquiry beyond what appears on the face of the proceedings. (1) These were all cases of the son challenging his father's alienation. But the same principle would apply to the sale by any other manager. The only difference between the two would be that on the sale being found to be void if the sale was a voluntary one, then the transferee could not claim even his transferor's interest. (2) This is, however, quite a different question and is the subject of another section.

127. (1) A decree passed against the manager in respect of a liability incurred within the scope of his authority is enforceable against the other members of the joint family though they may not have been parties to the suit.

(2) But in such case the other members are not precluded from contesting the authority of the manager or the binding nature of the debt.

(3) Where a decree directs sale of the right, title and interest of the defendant in any property, the question whether the sale so made suffices to pass the entire estate of which the defendant was the manager or only his own interest, is one of construction and intention to be gathered from the proceedings and other circumstances of the case.

(4) In particular and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing principle, in determining this question the following facts are material:—

- (a) The nature of the contract, if any.
- (b) The character of the debt.
- (c) The capacity in which the defendant is sued.
- (d) The intention of the court.
- (e) The price paid by the purchaser.
- (f) And any fact which shows what interest he intended to purchase.

1356. Analogous Law.—This rule flows from the last which recognizes the manager as the accredited representative of all members of the joint family in a suit, who are necessarily bound by any adjudication made therein and any decree passed thereon. It has now been so settled by the Privy Council in a case cited under the last section (1) in which the manager was held to fully represent the other members and his failure to redeem the joint property was held to effectively destroy the right of redemption of the entire co-parcenary.

It is immaterial whether the manager was the father or any other relation. (2)

1332. Where a decree is passed against the manager in a suit to which the other members are not parties, they are entitled to show, either in execution or in a suit of their own, that the decree does not affect their interest, either because the manager did not represent them or that the nature of the liability was such as not to bind their interests. This is conceded by the Privy Council who, referring to a decree passed against the father, said: "If his debt was of a nature to support a sale of the entirety, he might have legally sold it without suit, or the creditor might legally procure a sale of it by suit. All that the sons can claim is that not being parties to the sale or execution proceedings, they ought not to be barred from trying the fact or the nature of the debt in a suit of their own." (3) Their Lordships have reiterated this view in several cases. (4)

1358. An auction purchaser purchases whatever right, title and interest his judgment debtor may possess in the property at the date of attachment. He cannot set up the title of a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. Consequently, where the judgment debtor's indeterminate interest is sold, the purchaser's title will depend upon determination of the question what interest his judgment debtor had which the court could and did sell. If, for instance, the decree is against the father for his separate debt not binding on the son, the sale would convey to the purchaser only the father's interest. (5) An auction purchaser who is a stranger to the suit is not affected with notice of the character of the debt, though the case is different when the purchaser is the execution-creditor himself. (6)

1359. Decree for or against manager.—If the manager may sue or be sued on behalf of the joint family, it follows that any decree passed in such suit for or against him, would bind the family which he represents. This was the ratio decidendi of the Privy Council decision already cited. (7) It is immaterial whether the manager was the father or any other relation, (8) provided he was the manager, and had or was sued in that capacity. This must be clear from the record. It cannot be assumed. (9) It is stated that it is the ordinary practice in suits filed on the original side of the Bombay High Court by managers to join all co-parceners, and it was said that where in such a case the manager sued alone even stating in the plaint that he was suing as manager on behalf of a co-parcenary the minor co-parcener would not be bound by the proceedings unless by judicial sale under the decree, rights had been created in innocent third parties and no prejudice were shown to the absent minors.<sup>(1)</sup> This case was decided in 1906, but the Code of Civil Procedure enacted in 1908 now permits even partners to maintain and defend suits in the name of the firm,<sup>(2)</sup> and since a Hindu family has been spoken of and regarded as a corporation, there seems no reason why it should not be similarly represented by the manager. At any rate it is now so held by the Privy Council, though their Lordships' language is necessarily guarded, but it is clear that the only case in which they would permit the co-parceners to repudiate the authority of the manager is when he has acted in fraud of their rights, or when his interest was adverse, or that he has not otherwise fairly represented them.

1360 But there is no presumption that the manager has acted as such or that having so acted, he has not fairly represented the family.

1361. It is held that where the sons are not parties to the suit they are entitled to have an opportunity, either by a fresh suit or in execution of the decree to show that the decree does not bind their interests. This they may do by showing that the claim was not such as could bind their interests.<sup>(3)</sup> It has, however, been held that he cannot be permitted to do so in execution in which he is impleaded as the legal representative of his father.<sup>(4)</sup> This view proceeds upon the ground that a party in execution cannot go behind the decree. But a son may show that the decree passed against his father does not warrant seizure of his interest which would be a question relating to execution without affecting the decree. The question in such case is how far the terms of the decree precluded the trial of such questions. So where the father mortgaged "his right and interest" in a certain village which was decreed and sold and those words were used in the sale-certificate to define the interest sold to the purchaser the question arose what interest those words conveyed, whether only the father's interest or the interest of the entire family represented by himself and the four sons. The latter sued for a declaration that only the father's interest passed, but the Subordinate Judge dismissed their suit holding that since two of the sons had consented to the mortgage it referred to the entirety of the mortgaged property. The High Court reversed this decree holding that prima facie the father conveyed his own interest and this decree the Privy Council upheld on the ground that the sons were not made parties to the execution proceedings, adding, "If Bichuk relied on assent by the sons, he should have taken care to make them parties to the execution proceedings. In Deen Dayal's case<sup>(5)</sup> where the expressions used by the mortgagor were much more favourable to the conveyance of the entirety than they are here, the creditor's omission of the sons from the proceedings was made a material circumstance against him. And in Nanomi Babuasin's case<sup>(6)</sup> where the decision was in favour of the purchaser, the same circumstance was recognized as being material when the expressions by which the estate is conveyed to the purchaser are susceptible of application either to the entirety or the father's co-parcenary interest alone." (1) Then they added : "That when a man conveys his right and interest and nothing more, he does not prima facie intend to convey also rights and interests presently vested in others, even though the law may give him the power to do so. Nor do they think that a purchaser who is bargaining for the entire family estate would be satisfied with a document purporting to convey only the right and interest of the father." (2)

1362. Their Lordships also adverted to the fact that the creditor had taken no steps to bind the sons and that the price obtained appeared to be nearer the value of the father's share than of the entirety. This case is instructive. For it shows that the mere fact that the decree is obtained against the manager, would not necessarily cury with it the implication that it embraces all the interests of the joint family. The question is one of construction and intention. (3) So in another case where the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor was sold and the sons claimed exemption of their shares, the court examined the proceedings and found that since the defendant had been sued for arrears of land revenue which was a common liability of the family of which he was the manager, the decree intended to direct the sale of the entirety of the family property which was prima facie liable for the claim. (4) The fact that the junior members of the family are no parties to the proceedings is material but not conclusive, since the question still remains whether they were or not represented by their manager. (5)

1363. In suits by or against the manager, the first question that the court has to examine is the capacity in which the manager sues or is sued. If it be found that he was not sued in his representative character no further question would arise, but if

on the other hand it is not certain in what capacity he was sued, then the court would have to examine the pleadings to determine the nature of the obligation and to what extent it bound the family. If it appears that the manager was sued for a trade debt in respect of a business carried on for the benefit of the family, then the latter are unquestionably liable. (6) If the debt in respect of which the suit was filed was the father's debt the fact that the father was the holder of an impartible zamindari would not prevent the decree from being binding on the successor. So in such a case where the zamindar had contracted several debts, unsecured and secured, on parts of the zamindari, and on the suit of a creditor the whole estate was attached after which the zamindar having died, his son was brought on the record and he objected to the sale of his interest but the court ordered sale and sold "the right title and interest of the late zamindar" to a stranger. On the question arising as to what interest passed to the purchaser, the court held that in view of the debt of the father and the small price paid by the purchaser, what was intended to be sold was the life-interest of the father and not the whole interest in the zamindari. (7) The fact that an execution sale took place under an erroneous view of the law that no more than the life-interest of the zamindar could be sold, would not enlarge the interest of the purchaser if it is afterwards held that it was competent to the court to dispose of the entire interest.<sup>(1)</sup> As Lord Watson observed in another case of a sale in execution of a money decree, "the questions are what did the court intend to sell, and what did the purchaser understand that he bought."<sup>(2)</sup> These are questions of mixed law and fact, and must be determined according to the evidence in the particular case.<sup>(3)</sup> In cases of this kind the substance and not the mere technicalities of the transaction should be regarded.<sup>(4)</sup>

1364. So where in execution of a mortgage decree against the father of a joint Mitakshara family who alone was a party to the mortgage decree and the execution proceedings, the son objected to the sale of the entire estate on the ground that the father's debt was illegal and immoral and the order for sale was amended by adding the words "right, title and interest" of the judgment-debtor, which the court however added, was not intended to define what was actually sold. The son sued for a declaration that his interest was exempt but it was found that the father's debts were for legal and necessary purposes and the Privy Council held that as the sale was of an indeterminate interest, the definition of which depended upon the character of the debt and that as these were found to be legal, the interest which the purchaser took was the entire estate including the share of the son.<sup>(5)</sup> The contrary was held in another case in which the son succeeded in proving that the father had contracted the debt by fraudulently mortgaging a certain mouza to which he was not entitled.<sup>(6)</sup> There is no necessity to inquire into the nature of the debt if it is found that no more than the father's interest was sold. Such enquiry is only necessary when it is doubtful as to what was sold.<sup>(7)</sup>

1365. The fact that the decree was a mere money decree and the defendant the father against whom it was passed, is material but does not suffice to convey the son's interest in the joint property since it is not for every debt that the son is liable. If, however, the debt is shown to be the antecedent or necessary debt of the father, or there appears in anything from the record that the father was sued as head of the family, then the entire estate would pass on sale.<sup>(8)</sup>

1366. But the co-purchaser whose interest is put up for sale is entitled to show that it could not pass, either because the manager did not represent him or that the debt was not of such a nature as to convey his interest.<sup>(9)</sup> In the case of a money decree against the father, the presumption is that only the father's interest is sold. It is all that passes to the auction purchaser.<sup>(10)</sup> But this presumption may be rebutted by special circumstances showing an intention to sell the entire interest of the family in the property.<sup>(11)</sup> Where only the father's interest passes to the purchaser all that the purchaser can claim against a Mitakshara family is to enforce his vendors' right to partition.<sup>(12)</sup>

1367. There is a distinction between a money claim against the father and one made to enforce the father's mortgage of the family property. A decree in the one case, presumably affects only the father's interest; in the other case it relates presumably to the entire property mortgaged. (1) But the question is scarcely one for presumption, being rather one of fact as to what the father intended to mortgage. (2)

1368. The sons are not bound by the father's illegal or immoral debt. And they may show it at any stage of the suit whenever their own interests are in jeopardy. So where the father professed to mortgage a certain zamindari in which he had no interest of any kind, whereupon the mortgagee sued him for recovery of the debt upon his personal covenant and in execution had his right, title and interest sold to an auction purchaser who claimed the son's share on the ground that the decree was against the father, the court had no difficulty in exempting the son's claim on the ground that the debt was tainted with fraud and that the son's interest therefore could not and did not pass. (3)

128. (1) No debtor is liable to pay at the same time interest which exceeds the principal.

(2) This rule extends only to the areas within the original jurisdiction of the Calcutta High Court, (4) the Presidency of Bombay, (5) Sindh (6) and Berar (7):

(3) It does not apply to the following cases:—

(a) Where the debtor is not a Hindu. (8)

(b) Where the creditor is liable to account. (9)

(c) Where the debtor agrees to the capitalization of interest. (10)

(d) Where the debt merges in a decree. (11)

1369. Analogous Law.—The rule of Damdupat is thus stated:—

Manu :—Interest on money recovered at once or month by month, or day by day, as it ought, must never be more than enough to double the debt, that is, more than the amount of the principal paid at the same time. On grain, on fruit, on wool or hair, on beasts of burden, but to be paid in the same kind of equal value, it must not be more than enough to make the debt quintuple.

Stipulated interest beyond the legal rate, and different from the preceding rule is invalid and the wise call it an usurious way of binding and the lender is entitled at most to five in hundred (1).

Gautam : If the loan remains outstanding for a long time, the principal may be doubled (after which interest ceases). (2) The interest on produce, of animals, on wool, on the produce of a field, and on beasts of burden shall not increase more than the five fold value of the object lent (3)

1370. Rule of Damdupat.—Damdupat is the Hindu Law against usury.

At one time it appears to have had wider vogue than it has now, being merely confined to the Mahratta Provinces of Bombay and Berar (4) and the area subject to the original jurisdiction of the Calcutta High Court. It has been locally extended by the Ajmere Laws Act (5) only to cases where the mortgagee sues to enforce his mortgage, being inapplicable when the mortgagor seeks to redeem. (6)

It is said that the rule is inapplicable to mortgages, having been abrogated by the Transfer of Property Act (7) but there is no rule in that Act to repeal this rule of common law and the re-enactment of the Usurious Loans Act, 1917, leaves it intact.

1371. Law of Damdupat.—The Hindu rule of Damdupat was intended to correct the evils of usury. It has, however, outlived its day except in the areas stated in the section.

1372. The rule as stated in the texts prescribed that the amount of interest shall not exceed that of the principal paid at the same time. It does not mean that the amount of interest shall never exceed the principal. All it means is that at the same time interest in amount greater than the principal cannot be recovered. (8) Hence, if the principal remain outstanding and the interest be paid in smaller sums than the amount of the principal money, there is no limit to the amount which may be received for interest. (9) All that the rule prohibits is that the creditor may not recover more than double of the amount at any time remaining due, as on the last balance struck. He is not prevented from recovering more than the double of what he has actually lent. (10) The rule does not forbid the conversion of interest into capital by subsequent agreement. Nor does it preclude recovery of interest because the principal sum lent has been paid off. (11) The rule is applicable equally to cases whether the interest was to be paid in cash or grain (12) or whether the debt was or was not secured by a mortgage. (13)

Venkataramanajulu,* 26 M. 662, in which S. 4 of the Transfer of Property Act coupled with S. 37 of the Contract Act was overlooked.

It is however inapplicable unless there is only one account to be taken of principal and interest due on the mortgage, and no account of rents and profits on the other side. (1) If therefore, the mortgagee in possession has to account for the rents and profits, the rule would be inapplicable unless there was an express stipulation that the rents and profits are to be taken in lieu of a fixed portion of the interest. (2)

The rule though equally applicable to secured or unsecured debts does not apply to judgment-debts, after which in the words of the Privy Council, the matter pass out of the domain of contract into one of law. (3) So the interest which the court may award under the Civil Procedure Code is not subject to the rule, (4) nor is it applicable to the amount recoverable in execution of a decree. (5) But since in a mortgage, interest at the contractual rate is to be calculated up to the date of the dies datus fixed as required by O. 34, Rr. 2 and 4 of the Civil Procedure Code, it follows that the decree is equally subject to the Damduput rule up to that date after which it ceases to be operative. (6)

Then again the rule is inapplicable to cases in which there is a liability to account, though no account is in fact maintained or taken. (7) If the mortgagee is put in possession he becomes liable to account, and the moment his accountability begins the rule of Damduput ceases to apply. In such a case then, the rule can only be let in by an express provision in the mortgage deed or otherwise against his liability to account. (8)

1373. Only applies to Hindu debtor.—The rule is a rule of Hindu Law and applies only to a Hindu debtor, though it does not matter whether he is the plaintiff or the defendant. So where the mortgagor, a Mahomedan sued his Hindu mortgagee for the redemption of his mortgage, and upon an account being taken, it was found that the amount of interest far exceeded the principal, whereupon the plaintiff claimed the benefit of Damduput but the court overruled his contention holding that as the defendant, was not a debtor the rule was inapplicable to him. (9) A non-Hindu mortgagor, cannot by assigning his equity of redemption to a Hindu let in the rule to the prejudice of the creditor, (10) nor can the Hindu debtor transfer his personal equity to a non-Hindu with his debt (11). The rule of Damduput remains unaffected by the Transfer of Property (12) or the Interest Act (13) or the provisions of the Usury Act, their repeal (14) and re-enactment (15)

CHAPTER XI.

PARTITION.

1374. Topical Introduction.—The right of partition postulates a later development of archaic law. As stated before, the primal society was tribal and all that the tribe acquired was held in common without any right of alienation or division. The disruption of tribes into family groups marked a distinct advance in social evolution, but the incidents of tribal ownership continued and so Usanas declares that land was “indivisible among kinsmen even to the thousandth degree.” (1) As the families grew and became unwieldy and social conditions brought about greater security, the necessity of partition became inevitable. We have then the text: “land passes by six formalities; by consent of townsmen, of kinsmen or neighbours and of heirs, and by gift of gold and water.” “In regard to the immoveable estate, sale is not allowed; it may be mortgaged by consent of parties interested.” (2) That is to say, townsmen, neighbours, kinsmen and heirs were all interested in its disposal, for they were all at one time, joint owners of the tribal domain. As time advanced their hold on the land relaxed, and the kinsmen alone formed a group who jointly held and enjoyed the common land. Yet another stage separated even the kinsmen but the separation in possession was not recognized as any separation of titles. So Brihaspati ordains: “Separated kinsmen as those who are unseparated are equal in respect of immoveables, for one has not power over the whole to make a gift, sale or mortgage.” (3) But the same process which had put the townsmen and the neighbours out of account equally sufficed to place the separated kinsmen out of the family, contracted the individual rights of property, and the same texts which still recorded the history of the past had to be reconciled to the growing rights of property. As the communities became more scattered the law of convenience dictated the recognition of family rights. Individual effort began to be prized and a distinction became preceptible between individual acquisition and communal wealth. This is recognized in the following text of Brihaspati: “He among them who has made an acquisition, may take a double portion of it.” (4) This was the first recognition of the incentive to individual enterprise but it was half-hearted and eaten up by the exception. “But if the common stock be improved, an equal division is ordained.” (5) But the march of economic laws may be slowed, it cannot be thwarted. As the value of property grew and a keener competition for existence stimulated industry, the right of each member to separate his share could not longer be resisted. But this was not universally acknowledged. For instance, in Malabar a co-parcener has even now no right of partition, though the co-parcener is entitled to his self-acquired moveable property during his life-time, which on his death lapses to the tarwad. 1374. In places however, where the communal rights yielded to familial rights the community did not loose its hold upon such property. There then arose the right of pre-emption. Such is the right of pre-emption in the Punjab where the right was too well established to be shaken by the smaller families. But in more advanced sections of society both the communal and the familial rights have yielded to individual ownership. Such is the law of the Dayabhag in Bengal where a co-parcener enjoys rights in quasi severalty even when he is a member of a co-parcenary. But under the Mitakshara his rights are more medieval though here again, the presidencies of Bombay and Madras have adopted a view which recognizes the right of a co-parcener to alien his share for value. But the right of alienation though closely linked to the right of partition is yet distinct. The right of partition was the first to be forced for recognition. The right of alienation came in later. But they were both rights of property and have reacted upon one another. Take for instance, the case of Bengal where male and female co-parceners have alike the right to demand partition. And here the co-parceners enjoy the largest latitude of alienation.

1375. With the first concession of the right of partition the shares were unequally divided. "The portion deducted for the eldest is the twentieth part of the heritage, with the best of all the chattels; for the middlemost, half of that; for the youngest, a quarter of it." <sup>(1)</sup> But this practice was not uniform, since Manu declares that in a partition after the death of the father and mother, "the eldest brother may take the patrimony entire and the rest may live under him as under his father," <sup>(2)</sup> thus foreshadowing the rule of primogeniture which still survives in custom and is ordinarily applied to Jagirs, Rajas, Zemindaris, chieftainships and principalities. When the right of unequal division could no longer be tolerated, the custom changed but the written law could not be altered. This is how equality of partition became established: "An unequal partition is admissible in every period. How then is a restriction introduced, requiring that sons should divide only equal shares? The question is thus answered: True this unequal portion is found in the sacred ordinances; but it must not be practised, because it is abhorred by the world; since that is forbidden by the maxim 'practise not which is legal, but is abhorred by the world (for) it secures not celestial bliss' <sup>(3)</sup> as the practice of offering bulls is shunned on account of popular prejudice, notwithstanding the injunction 'offer to venerable priest a full or a large goat'; and as the slaying of a cow is for the same reason disused, notwithstanding the precept <sup>(4)</sup> 'slay a barren cow as a victim consecrated to Mitra and Varun.' Therefore, unequal partition, though noticed in the codes of law, should not be practised, since it is disapproved by the world and is contrary to scripture. For this reason, a restriction is ordained, that brothers should divide only in equal shares." <sup>(5)</sup>

1376. The history of the Mitakshara law of partition is thus an innovation on the ancient law. At first the right to divide rested with the father. It could not be enforced against his will. But later on it was recognized that what was right for the father to do was equally right for the son to demand. The only objection that could be taken to such enforced partition is prejudice to the father's afterborn issue. As to this the Mitakshara said: "While the mother is capable of bearing more sons and the father retains his worldly affections and does not desire partition, a distribution of the grandfather's estate does nevertheless take place by the will of the son."<sup>(1)</sup> But the son's right against the father is conditioned by the Mitakshara on the following facts: (i) It might be made by the father. (ii) Against the father if the father, is addicted to vice and the mother is past child bearing. But after the father's death partition could be had as a matter of course.<sup>(2)</sup> This text is now explained away as referring to the father's self-acquisitions.

129. (1) Partition is the intentional severance of co-parcenary interests by members of a joint family.

(2) An unequivocal expression of an intention to separate such interest may amount to partition.

(3) Partition may be effected by the definition of rights or by the division of property by metes and bounds.

Texts.

1377. Analogous Law.—The following texts bear on the subject of partition :—

(1) Narad :—Where a division of the paternal estate is instituted by sons, that becomes a topic of litigation called by the wise partition of heritage <sup>(3)</sup>

(2) Mitakshara :—Partition <sup>(4)</sup> is the adjustment of divers rights regarding the whole by distributing them on particular portions of the aggregate <sup>(5)</sup>

(3) Virmitrodaya :—Partition is the adjustment of the proprietary right into specific shares. <sup>(6)</sup>

(4) Dayabhag :—Partition is the allotment of separate portions of the family property to the co-sharers corresponding to the shares already owned by each. By partition an allotment is made in respect of the share of a co-parcener. <sup>(7)</sup>

(5) Raghuandan :—Partition is a distributive adjustment by lot or otherwise of the property of relatives vested in them, over the whole wealth, in right of the same relation, upon the extinction of the former owner's property <sup>(8)</sup>

(6) Mayukh :—Even where there is a total absence of common property a partition is effected by the mere declaration, 'I am separate from thee'. for partition is a particular condition of the mind and the declaration is indicative of the same. <sup>(9)</sup>

(7) Saraswati Vilas :—Without any formality partition can be effected by mere intention. <sup>(10)</sup>

1378. The Hindu Law of partition has been materially altered by the statute law which prescribes a special procedure for the partition of revenue paying estates by the Collector. (1) And the Partition Act of 1893 (2) generally empowers the court to sell the whole or any portion in order to prevent inconvenient divisions.

The effect of these statutes is to modify the procedure leaving the rights to be determined by Hindu Law.

1379. Gautam treats partition as one of the sources of property (3) and this view is echoed by the Mitakshara. This does not mean that before partition property does not vest in any one nor does it mean that before partition none of the co-parceners have any interest in the joint property. All that Gautam means is that before partition the right of a co-parcener was indeterminate and that partition defines and perfects it.

1380. What is partition.—The term “partition” involves the severance of undivided interests in common property. The very word “co-parcener” implies a right to the division of property. Cunningham defines partition as the process by which members of a joint family become separate, and cease to be co-parceners. (4) But this definition is too narrow since it is now settled that “a definite and unambiguous indication by one member of his intention to separate himself and to enjoy his share in severalty may amount to separation. But to have that effect the intention must be unequivocal and clearly expressed.” (5) This was pointed out by the same Board as far back as 1866 when referring to an argument that a partition deed was ineffectual to convert the undivided property until it has been completed by an actual partition by metes and bounds. Lord Westbury observed that the contention confounded the division of title with the division of the subject to which the title is applied. He then added : “When the members of an undivided family agree among themselves with regard to particular property, that it shall thenceforth be the subject of ownership in certain defined shares, then the character of undivided property and joint enjoyment is taken away from the subject-matter so agreed to be dealt with; and in the estate each member has thenceforth a definite and certain share which he may claim the right to receive and to enjoy in severalty although the property itself has not been actually severed and divided.” (6) This view has been since reiterated by the same Board in other cases, (7) in one of which they said : “Separation from the joint family involving the severance of joint status so far as the separating member is concerned, with all the legal consequences resulting therefrom, is quite distinct from the de facto division into specific shares of the property held until then jointly. One is a matter of individual decision, the desire on the part of any one member to sever himself from the joint family and to enjoy his hitherto undefined or unspecified shares separately from the others without being subject to the obligations which arise from the joint status, whilst the other is the natural resultant from his decision, the division and separation of his share which may be arrived at either by private agreement amongst the parties or on failure of that by the intervention of the court. Once the decision has been unequivocally expressed and clearly intimated to his co-sharers his right to obtain and possess the share to which he admittedly has a title is unimpeachable; neither the co-sharer can question it nor the court examine his conscience to find out whether his reasons for separation were well founded or sufficient; the court has simply to give effect to his right to have his share allocated separately from the others." (1)

The "intentional severance" mentioned in clause (1) may then be effected by a mere declaration or by some overt act, as in the case where one co-parcener "left the joint residence to withdraw himself from commensality as indicating a fixed determination henceforward to live separately from his cousin" and the court treated "the fact of his borrowing money for his maintenance as well as making a will as indicating, at all events, that he himself considered that a separation had taken place." The conclusion was based on the inference of intention derivable from the acts and declarations of the member who, it was alleged, had separated himself, and not from the conduct or attitude of any other party. (2)

The first essential condition of partition then is that it must be intended. The intention may be inferred from conduct, act, or declaration showing a determination to effect severance from the joint family.

1381 Such severance must be to determine the joint status, thus distinguishing partition from a mere family arrangement for convenience of management or possession. The severance may be of title, status, or possession but it must be with the intention to effect a severance.

The fact that a mere severance of interest does not constitute partition if such severance was not expressly or impliedly intended to have that effect, is the ratio decidendi of many cases. Such a case arose where the plaintiffs sued the defendants, for partition. The parties had long been separate in mess and residence, and as to estate the plaintiff's ancestors received some land, from the ancestors of the defendants by way of sir upon the income of which they maintained themselves. This sir did not correspond to the extent of the share which the plaintiff's branch would have received if there had been a partition. It was proved that there was a family custom according to which different members of the family on living separate, received similar allotments of sir for maintenance which were increased according to exigencies. There was such an increase at one time to the lands given to the plaintiff's branch, whereupon the Privy Council held that there had been no partition and as to the bar of limitation by the defendants the court held that the proceeds of the sir were payments by the defendants which kept alive the plaintiff's claim. 1382. Declaration of intention.-- It was at one time held that two things were at least necessary, to constitute partition namely the shares must be defined, and there must be distinct and independent enjoyment of those shares. <sup>(1)</sup> But as already stated, the Privy Council have in a series of cases laid down that the second condition is by no means a pre-requisite of a completed partition, <sup>(2)</sup> and that an unequivocal expression of intention clearly expressed may amount to partition. But the expression of such intention must be to presently appropriate and enjoy in a manner inconsistent with the ordinary state of enjoyment of an undivided family, that is, the expression must unequivocally create a present separation and not merely a contemplated separation. <sup>(3)</sup> So where two brothers, being members of a joint Mitakshara family executed an agreement whereby, after reciting that the declarants had remained joint and undivided and in commensality up to a certain date, and that portions of their properties, both moveable and immoveable, had been partitioned between them, they provided for the partition of the remaining joint properties by certain arbitrators appointed in that behalf, the court held the agreement of itself to amount to a separation of the brothers as a joint family and extinguished all rights of survivorship between them. <sup>(4)</sup> And so it has been held by the Privy Council that although a suit by a member of a joint Hindu family against his co-sharers for a separate share of the joint estate be not in terms a suit for partition, yet if it appears that the intention of the plaintiff was to obtain partition in the right of a co-parcener it does not require the consent of the other co-parceners to complete it. Severance of interest may be effected by an indirect act, such as sale of one's co-parcenary interest to another. <sup>(5)</sup> But in the North where a sale of undivided interest is not permitted, partition cannot be presumed from a mere sale though it is evidence from which partition might be inferred. So that where the members of a joint family agreed in writing that all the moveable and immoveable properties were to be divided as from the date of the agreement and that from that time forward separate accounts were to be kept by the co-parceners and the profit or loss subsequent thereto was on no account to be binding on the other co-parceners, the agreement was held to have effected a division in status, though there was no actual division of property by metes and bounds. <sup>(6)</sup> The giving of a notice or the institution of a suit would amount to such partition. So where a co-parcener sent a notice to the manager demanding

Namasimhulu*, 25 M. 149 (156) in which Bhasyam Ayyangar, J. held that a mere declaration was insufficient and that what was required was some further overt act namely the giving him "some trifle" out of the family property. (ib., p. 166 citing Mit 1 ii-11, 12; Manu IX 207; Yaj.ii 117). So Yaj. navalkya says: "The separation of one who is able to support himself and is not desirous of participation may be completed by giving him some trifle" (11-117). that his share be partitioned for which he instituted a suit pending which he died and the question arose whether he died joint or separated in estate the Privy Council said: "It would probably be enough for the determination of this appeal to say that nothing could be more unequivocal or more clearly expressed than the conduct of Harihar in indicating his intention to separate himself and enjoy his share in severalty by the notice of the 1st October 1908, completed with this suit, and that the acts amounted to a separation with all its legal consequences."<sup>(1)</sup> So partition is complete where the co-parceners enter into an agreement in which they declare each member entitled to a definite fractional part of the whole estate.<sup>(2)</sup>

1383. Partition by metes and bounds is then unnecessary to complete partition. <sup>(3)</sup> What is necessary is intention. So whether

Intention material. an agreement for the division of profits is merely an arrangement for convenience or a partition must depend upon the intention of parties to be gathered from the language of the instrument, though in construing instruments undue stress should not be laid on the words actually employed. As was said in a case: "Looking at the state of knowledge among even fairly educated Hindus, as to the exact principles of their own law (a point on which I do not mean to draw a comparison between them and the people of any European country at all to the disadvantage of the Hindus) looking to this fact, and to the inveterate habit of the natives to have accounts of the most important kinds drawn up by mere scribes, neither acquainted with law nor trained to precision of language, I have a strong repugnance to hold parties bound to a legal consequence arising from the use of particular terms, where surrounding circumstances appear to show that the parties had no such intention as that consequence would indicate, and that, in truth, the consequence was unforeseen."<sup>(4)</sup> The decision in this case was upheld on appeal by the Privy Council who referring to the agreement observed that the statement that the four co-sharers were in possession of equal shares of which they appropriated and enjoyed the profits in proportion to their respective shares pointed to an appropriation and enjoyment of the profits inconsistent with that which is the normal state of enjoyment of a joint and undivided Hindu family, and that their resolve to have the shares mutated in accordance with their actual possession and enjoyment "appeared to their Lordships to be strong prima facie evidence of the intention to hold the undivided shares as the separate property of each co-parcener. It may not be conclusive but at all events it is strong prima facie evidence of such intention." They then added that though the deed did not declare that after the agreement the family was to be divided, at the same time there was a statement consistent with their continued indivision and that therefore it must be presumed that the agreement was only consistent with partition and inconsistent with continued jointness. <sup>(5)</sup>

1384. It is thus clear that mere definition of interest with the intention to separate, constitutes partition. "Partition does not give him a title or create a title in him, it only enables him to obtain what is his own in a definite and specific form for purposes of disposition independent of the wishes of his former co-sharers." (1)

1385. Division of rights.—It is seen that an intentional severance of joint interests amounts to partition. It has also been seen
Cl. (3). that such severance may be effected by a mere verbal declaration unaccompanied by any overt act, from which it follows that partition may be effected by a mere division of rights without any physical division by metes and bounds. So Lord Westbury said: "It is necessary to bear in mind the twofold application of the word 'division'. There may be a division of right and there may be a division of property. And thus after the execution of this instrument, there was a division of right in the whole property, although in some portions that division of right was not intended to be followed up by actual partition by metes and bounds, that being postponed till some future time when it would be convenient to make that partition." (2) And later on he said: "Then if there be a conversion of the joint tenancy of an undivided family, into a tenancy in common of the members of that undivided family, the undivided family becomes a divided family with reference to the property that is the subject of that agreement, and that is a separation in interest and in right although not immediately followed by a de facto actual division of the subject-matter. This may, at any time, be claimed by virtue of the separate right." (3) So where after the death of one of the members of a joint family in 1861 the survivors mutually agreed that the joint property should be thenceforth held and enjoyed by the various members of the family in certain defined shares which they specified in a petition to the Collector dated 13th June 1861 to have their names entered to that effect in the official papers of the village which was done, and the petition was filed in the Collectorate and entries were made in the village papers in accordance with it up to 1899, it was held by the Privy Council—(reversing the Allahabad High Court) that on the evidence, in the circumstances of the case, a partition of the property had been effected in 1861 and that the transactions and conduct of the members of the family with respect to the management of the property had been on the basis that it was held in separate shares from that time. (4) The decree passed in the suit assigns him that share, to which he would be entitled on partition, and such decree does in fact effect a partition, at all events of such rights which is effectual to destroy the joint estate. So where a co-parcener by name Shiv Prasad Giri in consequence of his cousin Joy refusing to allow him any participation in their joint estate, left the house in which they had jointly resided, went to reside with the husband of his sister and had to maintain himself for sometime by moneys which he borrowed before he sued for his share in which he obtained a decree, but while it was pending before His Majesty in Council, he died devising his estate to his sister's son and thereupon the defendant Joy claimed the estate by survivorship.

The Privy Council concurred with the courts in India in rejecting Joy's claim and said: "Their Lordships regard the conduct of Shiv Prasad Giri when he left the house in which both he and Joy Narain Giri lived and withdrew himself from commensality with his cousin, as indicating a fixed determination henceforth to live separate from his cousin, and they treat the fact of his borrowing money for his separate maintenance, as well as making a will as indicating at all events, that he himself considered that a separation had taken place." (1)

1386. The mere institution of a suit for partition may be regarded as an unequivocal expression of such intention. (2) But such intention cannot be inferred from a suit for a mere declaration of the plaintiff's right to a share in the estate of his father, since such a suit would not be inconsistent with an intention on his part to obtain a declaration of his being entitled to a joint interest (3) in a joint estate.

1387. Since intellectual partition is completed on a mere expression of an intention to separate, the fact that the parties thereafter continued to live together and enjoy their share in common might affect the mode of enjoyment but apart from reunion, it cannot restore the previous status of jointness. (4)

A had three sons—one by his first wife, and two by his second wife. He executed a will by which he authorized his executors to effect a partition among his sons when the eldest of them attained the age of majority. The executors did as they were directed. Properties were divided into three shares—one of which was allotted to the eldest son and two to the other two sons. The deed of separation provided that if any property was left undivided it should be divided into three shares by the three parties, and that in future the parties should have no connection in respect of property except relationship by blood. It was held that these provisions effected a severance in interest as between the sons of the second wife also, though their property was kept together without any division. (5) It is quite competent to the members of a joint family to have a completely divided status even though the division of the properties by metes and bounds is actually effected only in respect of certain items of property. (6)

1388. Effect of a minor's suit.—It being now settled that the mere filing of a suit for partition amounts to the unequivocal declaration of intention which law regards as a sufficient partition in law, the question arises whether the same rule would hold good where the plaintiff is a minor. On this subject two views are possible and both have received support. One is that the minor is no exception to the rule since he makes his declaration through his next friend (7) and the other is that since the partition of his share is discretionary with the court, there can be no partition till the court uses its discretion in his favour. (8) But this view ignores the fact that partition may be effected out of court and the minor suffers from no impediment of procedure if he exercises his election through his qualified mouthpiece.

1389. Dayabhag law distinguished.—The rule of law stated in the clause is stated to be inapplicable to a Dayabhag family, “because although as regards the enjoyment of the family property there is no difference between a Dayabhag joint family and a Mitakshara joint family, there is this substantial difference between the two, that in the latter case the co-parceners hold as joint tenants while in the former they hold as tenants-in-common. The ascertainment of the shares in the one case affords no indication of an intention to destroy the unity of the family, because such shares are already determined by the law. In the other case, however, the definition of such shares would afford a very strong indication of partition, and would ordinarily amount to partition unless the strongest proof was afforded of an intention to remain united in estate or to become reunited. It may be further pointed out that in the case of a Dayabhag family, even the division of income for the convenience of the different members would not, in the absence of intention, amount to the division of the family.” (1) There is, however, no distinction in principle between the two schools. The question is one of intention in both cases and it is for the court to decide whether conduct in a given case is a sufficiently unequivocal expression of an intention to separate.

Family arrangement.

(2) It differs from partition in that it is an agreement for separate enjoyment by members without determination of their rights.

1390. Analogous Law.—“The rule here stated is not merely the rule of Hindu Law; but is founded upon a broad principle of equity which has a wider application. (2) So Cockburn, C. J., said: “The authorities clearly establish that if an agreement is made to compromise a disputed claim, forbearance to sue in respect of that claim is a good consideration; and whether proceedings to enforce the disputed claim have or have not been instituted makes no difference. If the defendant’s contention were adopted, it would result that in no case of a doubtful claim could a compromise be enforced. Everyday a compromise is effected on the ground that the party making it has a chance of succeeding in it, and if he bona fide believes he has a fair chance of success, he has a reasonable ground for suing, and his forbearance to sue will constitute a good consideration. When such a person forbears to sue he gives up what he believes to be a right of action, and the other party gets an advantage, and instead of being annoyed with an action, he escapes from the vexations incident to it.” (3) The arrangement does not depend for its validity upon any right, for the plaintiff may have no right at all, and the defendant may know it, yet if the plaintiff believed that he had a right and the defendant preferred its settlement to trial by court it is a good settlement binding on the parties. <sup>(1)</sup> It is not a nudum pactum because the settlement of a dispute is in itself a good consideration provided that there was some dispute to settle and the party making a claim bona fide believed in it. <sup>(2)</sup> In the case of family arrangements the consideration is not the sacrifice of any right, but the settlement of a dispute and the court does not consider narrowly the quantum of consideration. Equity leans towards the maintenance of family arrangements and a fair settlement of the dispute is, as already stated, a sufficient consideration in such cases. <sup>(3)</sup>

These principles have been given effect to by the Privy Council in several cases <sup>(4)</sup> to be presently considered.

This fact distinguishes a settlement from what may be a colourable transaction which may bear the appearance of a settlement but be in reality a fictitious transaction.

1391. A family arrangement as distinguished from a partition is an amicable settlement made by members of a joint family to avert the costliness and bitterness of a formal partition. Where, for instance, the sons desire to separate from their father and there is a dispute as to whether certain parcels of property are self-acquired or ancestral and there is no other means of settling the dispute otherwise than by the arbitrament of law, parties may give and take and execute mutual releases agreeing to hold what they have got thenceforward in severalty. It is a family arrangement and not a partition, because parties have agreed to a course without advertance to their legal rights. The motive of the settlement is the purchase of peace, and where there is a motive, the courts do not enquire into the sufficiency of consideration <sup>(5)</sup> or disturb the arrangement on the ground of its inequality <sup>(6)</sup> unless there was fraud or some other ground to vitiate it in law. <sup>(7)</sup> The arrangement binds both the parties and their issue. <sup>(8)</sup> This arrangement may extend to treating self-acquired property as joint or vice versa <sup>(9)</sup> or it may be the culmination of a suit for partition in which the parties arrive at the settlement of a dispute which they desire to close. <sup>(10)</sup> Such settlement cannot be set aside upon the ground that it was accepted under a misconception of facts or an erroneous view of one's rights or that it has given to one party more than he was legally entitled to and would have recovered if he had taken the judgment of the court upon it. <sup>(11)</sup>

1392. It is not essential for its validity that a settlement should have been acted upon, though the fact that it has been acted upon adds to its binding force.

1393. It is a mistake to suppose that the doctrine of family arrangements extends no further than arrangements for the settlement of doubtful or disputed rights. The principle is applicable not merely to cases in which arrangements are made between members of a family for the preservation of its peace, but also to cases in which arrangements are made between them for the preservation of its property. <sup>(1)</sup>

1394. Family arrangements are governed by a special equity peculiar to themselves and will be enforced if honestly made, although they have not been meant as a compromise but have proceeded from an error of all parties originating in mistake or ignorance of fact as to what their rights actually are or of the points on which their rights actually depend. <sup>(2)</sup>

1395. Partition distinguished.—Though a partition is confined to only specified relations a family arrangement is not similarly limited. So the Privy Council said: "There can be no partition directly between grandfather and grandson while the father is alive. But it is a family arrangement, partaking so far of the nature of a partition that Udai Narayan receives a portion and is thenceforth totally excluded, and quod ultra, Matadyal surrenders his interest to his grandson who on a complete partition among the whole family would be entitled to one-fourth. Now in such an arrangement it would be quite consistent with Hindu ideas of ancestral property to express a desire that the whole generation to which the property was transferred should benefit by it. . . . The notions present to the mind of the head of a joint Hindu family who is making a family arrangement are something very different from notions present to the mind of an English testator when he makes a gift to a class". <sup>(3)</sup>

1396. It has already been seen that a family arrangement may be made without reference to or determination of the legal rights of the parties. The fact that a person has obtained by a family arrangement what he could never have obtained by partition is no blot upon its validity. Such for instance would be the grant of land by the holder of an impartible estate to the members of his family in the shape of maintenance or other grants. It may be that the grantee has no legal claim to maintenance but the grant once made cannot be resumed on that account.

1397. Release.—A party may relinquish his right, or execute a release which may be supported as a family arrangement. <sup>(4)</sup> But where a co-parcener released his share in favour of the rest who were to pay the debts it was held that the release was void though registered and that even S. 25 of the Contract Act could not save it. But the judgment appears to be unsound and proceeds upon the view that because the creditors could still hold him liable for the debt, the relinquishment failed for want of consideration. <sup>(5)</sup> But if

When a family arrangement may be set aside

(2) In particular and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing rule it may not be set aside upon any of the following grounds :—

(a) That there was no consideration to support it. (1)

(b) That it has transferred property to a person without any right. (2)

(c) That it was unfair and such as no court would support upon its merits. (3)

(d) That it was made by mistake of either party. (4)

(3) It may however be set aside on the ground that it was not bona fide or that there was no dispute.

(4) But before giving weight to these considerations due regard must be had to the time during which the arrangement has been acted upon or has remained unchallenged. (5)

1398. Family arrangement: valid and void.—The compromise or settlement of a family dispute and an acceptance of a given distribution instead of a general partition, are upheld by the courts as necessary to check litigation <sup>(1)</sup> and to preserve the peace of families. The only condition required to support it is that it must be the bona fide settlement of a family dispute; or in other words, there must be a dispute and its settlement. If this is conceded the court will not scan too closely the rights of the contending parties affected thereby. The fact that one party had yielded to a claim in honest error is no ground for repudiating it when the error is discovered unless the other party was an accessory. This was settled by Lord Eldon who ruled that family arrangements without fraud must be established, though founded in mistake; but they would not be supported if founded on mistake of either party to which the opposite party was an accessory. A family arrangement concluded in honest error, is binding unless either party has been misled by the concealment of material things, for the family agreement requires communication of all material circumstances. So Lord Eldon, L. C. said: "Where family agreements have been fairly entered into without concealment of or imposition upon either side, with no suppression of what is true, or suggestion of what is false, then although the parties may have greatly misunderstood their situation and mistaken their rights, a court of equity will not disturb the quiet, which is the consequence of that agreement; but when the transaction has been unfair and founded upon falsehood and misrepresentation, a court of equity would have a very great difficulty in permitting such a contract to bind the parties." <sup>(2)</sup> In a settlement of a doubtful right truth may be on either side, but it is of the essence of a settlement that investigation is stopped and a settlement concluded to restore harmony. So where three sons one of whom being a minor was represented by his father effected a partition on the basis of which a suit was filed. It was however opposed on the ground that there was no partition but merely a working arrangement in which no account was taken of the joint property, that it was partial and incomplete and that there was a mistake in the scheme of division adopted at the private partition. The court however, overruled all these objections holding that a family arrangement could not be set aside on any of the grounds urged <sup>(3)</sup> So where the co-parceners had agreed to admit the adopted son of a widow, who under the Mithila law was only entitled to the lady's stridhan, in the mistaken belief of law that he was a co-parcener, the Privy Council refused to dissolve the settlement holding that it was a mistake which could not prejudice the adopted son who was not an accessory. <sup>(4)</sup> So in another case in which the plaintiff sued to set aside a partition on the ground of coercion, fraud, undue haste and gross inequality, the Privy Council found the first two facts not proved and the other two insufficient to annul it. <sup>(5)</sup> So where the question was whether certain persons were entitled to the properties in dispute, their predecessors-in-title being themselves illegitimate sons of their father to whom they could not inherit, the Privy Council held the question immaterial on the finding that they had obtained their estate under compromise or family arrangement which proceeded on the basis of their legitimacy. <sup>(6)</sup>

(6) Gajapathi v. Gajapathi, 13 M. J. A. 497 (512).

1399. In another case three brothers had entered into an agreement on the assumption that their family estate was impartible and subject to the rule of primogeniture. As such, the two junior widows merely received land in lieu of maintenance. Later on the estate being partible, one of them sued for partition but the Privy Council threw out his suit on the ground that he was bound by the family arrangement. (1) The same view was taken in another case in which one brother gave another a share out of his self-acquisition believing it to be joint. (2)

1400. Consideration.—A family arrangement cannot be supported on the ground that it is a valid contract. As such it requires consideration to support it. (3) But as every promise and every set of promises form the consideration for each other (4) and reciprocal promises are consideration for each other (5) it follows that a family arrangement would be supported by consideration if it is the result of mutual promises or relinquishments. (6)

No extraneous consideration is then required to support a family arrangement. As observed in a case approved by the Privy Council, "The true character of the transaction appears to us to have been a settlement between the several members of the family of their disputes, each relinquishing all claim in respect of all property in dispute other than that falling to his share, and recognizing the right of the others as they had previously asserted it to the portion allotted to them respectively. It was in this light rather than as conferring a new and distinct title on each other, that the parties themselves seem to have regarded the arrangement, and we think that it is the duty of the courts to uphold and give effect to such an arrangement." (7)

1401. The settlement of a mutual dispute and the purchase of peace is in itself a sufficient consideration required to validate such an agreement. (8) The relinquishment by one is consideration for the relinquishment by the other (9) or as Parke, B. said: "the agreement by each individual to give up part of his claim is a sufficient consideration". (10) The court will not consider the quantum of consideration too nicely in a family settlement even when there were no rights in dispute, if sufficient motive for the arrangement is proved. (11)

1402. Right immaterial.—So it is immaterial that the arrangement has transferred property to one who had no legal right to it. As previously remarked the difficulty of ascertaining the rights is a justification for the settlement. Even where the rights are plain its proof or acknowledgment might be difficult. If a family settlement could be set aside on proof of legal title, no settlement would be made since the proof of legal title would entitle the parties to their legal remedies and there would be no occasion for a private settlement which law encourages as being in the interest of peace and concord.

1403. Unfair arrangement.—Family arrangements are governed by a special equity peculiar to themselves and will be enforced

Cl. (c). if honestly made although they have not been meant as a compromise, but have proceeded from an error of all parties originating in mistake or ignorance of fact as to what their rights<sup>2</sup> actually are, or of the points on which their rights actually depend. When the responsible members of a family agree to the arrangement, which is per se not unfair and has been arrived at without undue advantage being taken, the courts will be slow to interfere when subsequently one of the parties wishes to have that arrangement set aside.<sup>(1)</sup>

1404. Though unfairness per se is no blot upon an agreement, it is evidence of fraud, and where an arrangement is shown to be so unfair that one could not have acceded to it without the exercise of undue advantage or coercion, the court may cancel the arrangement, not because it was unfair but because it was fraudulent. So where there is inequality of position, mutual mistake or of any of those elements which dissolve the most solemn acts of parties, the court will not be slow to give effect to its conclusions. But the inclination of the court is always against it, even though a minor be concerned <sup>(2)</sup>

1405. Unilateral mistake.—So again the fact that the arrangement was due to a mistake of either side is no ground for

Cl. (d). rescinding a settlement any more than it is a ground for rescinding a contract. <sup>(3)</sup> So where A believes B to be entitled to co-parcenary right, which he as the adopted son of a widow subject to the Mithila law was not, his mistake being in no way induced by B cannot prejudice the the latter and a settlement made with him cannot be set aside on that ground. <sup>(4)</sup>

1406. Mistake in law is not a ground for setting aside a compromise, if the parties to the transaction were in difficulty and doubt,

Mistake of law. and wished to put an end to disputes and to terminate or avoid litigation. If one or more parties having, or supposing they have, claims upon a given subject matter or claims against each other, agree to compromise these claims, and the knowledge, or means of knowledge, of each of them with respect to the mode in which, and the circumstances under which, his claim arises, stand upon an equal footing and there is an absence of fraud or misrepresentation, the transaction is binding although the conclusion at which the parties may have arrived is not that which a court of justice would have arrived at had its decision been sought. The real consideration which each party receives under a compromise being, not the sacrifice of the right, but the settlement of the dispute and the abandonment of the claim, it is no objection to the validity of the transaction that the right was really in one of the parties only, and that the others had no right whatever. If, for instance, two parties claim adversely to each other the inheritance of a deceased person, and, in order to avoid litigation, agree to divide the inheritance, it is no ground for setting aside the agreement that only one was heir, and that the other gave up the right which he really possessed. The fact that the one may have had no claim is immaterial, if he was honestly mistaken as to his claim. It is enough if, at the time of the compromise, he may have believed he had a claim, and that the parties have, by the transaction, avoided the necessity of going to law. To render valid the compromise of a litigation, it is not even necessary that the question in dispute should really be doubtful, if the parties bona fide consider it to be so. It is enough to render a compromise valid, that there is a question to be decided between them. A compromise of doubtful rights will not be set aside on any other ground than fraud. (1) This is the rule of law regarding compromises generally. But the Courts go still further in favour of upholding compromises by which family disputes are settled as appears from the following passage in the same treatise: "The principles which apply to the case of ordinary compromise between strangers, do not equally apply to the case of compromises in the nature of family arrangements. Family arrangements are governed by a special equity peculiar to themselves, and will be enforced if honestly made, but have proceeded from an error of all parties originating in mistake or ignorance of facts as to what their rights actually are, or of the points on which their rights actually depend." (2)

1407. Arrangement when set aside.—A family arrangement may however be set aside on the ground of mutual mistake, inequality of position, undue influence, coercion, fraud or any similar ground, provided it is clearly established by evidence. (3) Where for instance, two persons collude to the prejudice of a third, the latter may set aside the transaction as compassed to his prejudice. So where one party has taken advantage of the other, the court will not permit him to retain it even though it had received the sanctity of a family arrangement. Such was the case of the defendant who had made a settlement with his brother, plaintiff in the case, who believed that he was the illegitimate son of his parents but which the defendant knew he was not, as he was aware of the private marriage of their parents before the plaintiff's birth which fact he did not communicate to the plaintiff, whereupon the court set aside the settlement holding that it was the duty of the defendant to undeceive the plaintiff as to the fact of the marriage and that if thereafter the plaintiff had decided for himself that the ceremony was not valid, and treating it as not a marriage de jure, had chosen to enter into the contract, there would have been no ground for the suggestion of the imposition. (4) In another case a compromise was set aside at the instance of a minor because the court had sectioned it under a misapprehension or mistake as to material facts. (5) There is nothing illegal in an agreement between expectant heirs to divide their expectancies and such agreements are not obnoxious to the rule against the transfer of a mere spes successionis. (6) Of course, parties cannot alter the incidents of a property by any agreement between them. They cannot for instance, render partible property impartible by any family arrangement conferring the estate on the eldest son. An arrangement so made would be void as opposed to public policy. (7)

(7) Muthusami v. Muthusami, 27 I.C. (M) 3.

1408. When acted upon.—An arrangement materially gains in strength if it is acted upon by the party interested in challenging it. Such was the case of a brother who had received a maintenance allowance under a settlement made under the mistaken belief that he was not entitled to partition the family estate, which he erroneously believed to be impartible for about ten years, on which the Privy Council observed: "If this be a valid document and not open to challenge on the ground of fraud or upon any other ground, their Lordships would be slow to fail to give effect to a family arrangement of the kind thus expressed, followed as it has been by enjoyment and possession for a period of ten years". (1)

In this connection it would not be amiss to mention that relief on the ground of fraud or mistake can only be given if it is claimed within three years when the fraud or mistake is known to the plaintiff. (2)

1409. Practice—Where the arrangement was reduced to writing it was thrown out of the case for want of registration. The pleadings on the nature of the document were inconsistent throughout, sometimes the parties relied on it as a settlement, while at other times it was alleged to be a will. The Privy Council held that it was bound to give effect to the real character of the instrument which they held to be a family settlement. As such it was inoperative as regards immoveable property, but was otherwise valid and could be given effect to. But inasmuch as both parties had made inconsistent pleas anent there-to the court deprived the successful appellant of his costs. (3)

1410. A deed of release whereby the releasor simply undertakes to vacate house may be operative as a bona fide settlement of a family dispute, even though it contains no words of conveyance. (4)

Whom it binds

132. A family arrangement binds both the parties and their legal representatives.

1411. Analogous Law.—It has already been stated that in making a compromise it is competent to the father to represent his minor sons, (5) the manager the joint family, the guardian his ward, (6) and it is equally competent to the widow in possession of her husband's estate to make a settlement binding on the reversioners. (7)

133. No writing is required to effect partition, but if it is reduced to writing, which purports or operates to create, declare, assign, limit or extinguish, whether in present or in future, any right, title, or interest, whether vested or contingent, of the value of Rs. 100 and upwards, to or in immoveable property, it must be stamped and registered.

1412. Analogous Law.—The Transfer of Property Act provides that certain transfers therein mentioned should be in writing, but partition is not a transfer of any rights but is merely a change in the enjoyment of property. It is not an exchange<sup>(2)</sup> and as such the Transfer of Property Act does not affect a partition and there is no other statute which prescribes the necessity of writing. The Registration Act however provides for the compulsory registration of all documents which purport or operate to create, declare, assign, limit any right, title or interest, whether vested or contingent of the value of Rs. 100 and upwards to or in immoveable property.<sup>(3)</sup> As a deed of partition is one such document it follows that if it purports or operates as such it must be registered.<sup>(4)</sup>

1413. No writing is required to effect partition<sup>(5)</sup> but if it is reduced to writing which purports or operates to create, declare, assign, limit or extinguish, whether in present or in future, any right, title, or interest, whether vested or contingent, of the value of one hundred rupees and upwards, to or in immoveable property, it must be registered.

1414. The question then arises what documents purport or operate to 'Purport' to be a deed of partition. A document 'purporting' to be a partition deed must be executed as such. Its formality and language must conform to such deed, though it may fail of its effect. Such a document may recite an accomplished fact and be a mere written memorial of the past. It would not then require registration.<sup>(6)</sup> Then again a deed may operate as a partition though in form it may be in the form of a will, agreement or award or a mere receipt, in all of which cases, if it creates a definite change of legal relation to the property of the person executing

C. 387, the lists were memoranda of a previously completed partition and so their registration was considered unnecessary.

it, then it would be compulsorily registrable.”<sup>(1)</sup> So where two co-parceners by agreement appointed a sole arbitrator to effect partition of their joint ancestral property and consented that the partition effected by the arbitrator, by taking the bids of the parties for the property will be accepted, and the award was thereon made and written upon the back of the said agreement which was not registered, it was held that the document was intended to be and was regarded by the parties as an instrument declaring rights over immoveable property and consequently compulsorily registrable. <sup>(2)</sup>

1415. A document may declare a right though it may not be final and parties may contemplate the reduction of its terms into another document. <sup>(3)</sup> So again it is immaterial that the document is an award if it is countersigned by the parties in token of their acceptance of its terms which makes it their own contract. <sup>(4)</sup> So a document which after reciting the allotment of lands contained an agreement to act accordingly, was held to be compulsorily registrable because it related to a partition transaction completed by the agreement contained therein. <sup>(5)</sup>

1416. Where a document recites a past partition and completes it by partitioning the remaining property, it would be compulsorily registrable if the property presently partitioned under it is of Rs. 100 or more in value. <sup>(6)</sup>

A mere draft deed of partition is not compulsorily registrable. <sup>(7)</sup>

1417. Where a partition deed deals with property both moveable and immoveable, the fact that it is not registered cannot affect any immoveable property comprised therein or be received as evidence “of any transaction affecting such property.” <sup>(8)</sup> This phrase is ambiguous and might either mean that it shall not be evidence of the partition so as to affect the immoveable property therein mentioned which seems to be the meaning <sup>(9)</sup> or it may mean that it is not evidence of the partition at all because the deed affects immoveable property even as regards the moveable property, <sup>(10)</sup> or because the deed cannot be held partially admissible. The transaction being one and indivisible, it must stand or fall together, it being presumed that the division of the moveables was not made without division of the immoveables. <sup>(11)</sup> But it is submitted that a document may be admissible without being operative.

1418. The documents executed in consequence of partition such as mutual releases would of course require to be registered. <sup>(12)</sup>

1419. Effect of non-registration.—It is provided in S. 49 of the Registration Act that “no document required by S. 17 to be registered shall affect any immoveable property comprised therein or be received as evidence of any transaction affecting such property.”

Now since the fact of separation is something different from the allotment of shares it follows that the existence of an unregistered partition-deed is no impediment to the proof of the existence of a particular status. So where the question was whether a particular property claimed by the plaintiff to be joint family property was at the date of suit joint or separate and there was evidence that there was a partition in the family which was recorded in an unregistered partition-deed, it was held that though the terms of the partition could not be proved by parol, there was nothing to prevent the parties from proving aliunde the fact of separation. (1)

Persons entitled to partition.

134. The following persons are entitled to claim partition of joint property:—

- (1) Adult co-parceners not disqualified for inheritance.
- (2) Minor co-parcener, if the partition of his share would advance or protect his interest.
- (3) Co-parcener's transferee acquiring a partible interest in the joint property.

1420. Analogous Law.—Theoretically every co-parcener is entitled to demand a separation of his share which is commended by the ancient writers.

Manu:—111 Either let them thus live together, or if they desire separately to perform religious rites, let them live apart; since religious duties are multiplied in separate houses, their separation is therefore, legal and even laudable (2)

1421. The right of partition originally belonged to the father. He could make a partition if he chose but the sons had no right to demand partition. Such is the present law of Bengal. So in one case Innes, J. said: "An action will not indeed lie unless there is something clearly indicating that the interests of the infant will be advanced by partition, because ordinarily speaking, the family estate is better managed and yields a greater ratio of profit in union than when split up and distributed amongst the several parceners, and as a general rule, therefore, it is more profitable for an infant parcener that his estate should continue an integral portion of the whole estate in the hands of kinsmen." (3)

1422. His right to partition then depends upon the questions of necessity and benefit to him and his estate. Necessity for partition may arise if the manager is guilty of malversation (1) or waste, or declares himself as holding adversely to him. Such was the case of the illegitimate son of a Shudra father who sued his father's sons for a partition of his share which the court decreed because the defendants had denied his title to any property. (2) It may be that though jointness may not prejudice the minor, yet partition may benefit him. In that case partition cannot be refused. (3) On the other hand it cannot be decreed upon grounds apprehended but not proved. (4)

Yajnavalkya says:—When the father makes a partition, let him separate his sons from himself at his pleasure and either dismiss the eldest with the best share, or if he choose all may be equal sharers. (5)

1423. Originally the shares allotted to each co-sharer on partition were unequal. But there was a revolt against this inequality. And so the Mitakshara had to concede equal partition (§ 1375).

1424. It however does not permit a partition between the grandfather and the grandson while the father is alive. (6) This is supported by the following text :—

Mitakshara:—If the father be alive, and separate from the grandfather, or if he have no brothers, a partition of the grandfather's estate with the grandson would not take place; since it has been directed that the shares shall be allotted in right of the father, if he be deceased; or admitting partition to take place, it would be made according to the pleasure of the father, like a distribution of his own acquisitions; to obviate this doubt the author (7) says, "For the ownership of father and son is the same in land which was acquired by the grandfather or in a corrody or in chattels (which belonged) to him". (8)

1425. The minor co-parcener's right to demand partition is conditional upon its being to his advantage, the view of law being that his interests are safe in a joint family and it is only when that presumption is rebutted by any special reason assigned to the contrary that he is allowed to sue for partition as of right. The rule is the outcome of decided cases in which it is laid down that a minor cannot leave his family unless it will be to his own advantage (9) either by protecting or advancing his interest.

1426. The right of the co-parcener's transferee to call for a general partition has already been the subject of extended discussion (§§ 123+1251).

1427. The father is vested under the Hindu Law with power to effect a partition of ancestral property without the consent of the sons (10) though he cannot do so by a will, (11) unless the disposition so made is accepted by the sons in which case it operates as a partition destroying their right of survivorship. 1428. Who may claim partition.—Generally speaking all co-parceners are entitled to claim partition. But this rule is subject

Cl. (1) Co-parceners. to three exceptions, two of which are textual and the third is due to cases. The texts declare a person disqualified to inherit as incompetent to take a share. Such persons are those born deaf, dumb, or blind <sup>(1)</sup> or without a limb or organ, such as those born idiots <sup>(2)</sup> and eunuchs or without a leg, nose or tongue. <sup>(3)</sup> Persons suffering from lunacy <sup>(4)</sup> and leprosy <sup>(5)</sup> or from any incurable disease though not congenitally, are equally disqualified for their share.

1429. Another textual exemption is said to disqualify the son to demand a partition of his share from his grandfather so long as the father is alive. <sup>(6)</sup> This is explained by Yajnavalkya as due to the identity of the father and son but the identity extends even up to the grandfather. But it is said that though the two cannot divide there may be a family arrangement, and a transfer made by the grandfather to his grandson with the consent of the father would be upheld as a valid gift. <sup>(7)</sup>

1430. But the view that the son cannot enforce a partition against his grandfather during his father's life-time goes against the vested theory of his right and has been combated by Telang, J. in a Bombay case, <sup>(8)</sup> by a Full Bench of the Allahabad Court, <sup>(9)</sup> and cases of both of the Calcutta <sup>(10)</sup> and Madras High Court. <sup>(11)</sup> The force of this almost unanimous attack upon the narrow doctrine published in a single Full Bench case of the Bombay High Court from which Telang, J. dissented in a considered judgment was felt by Tyabji, J. who however felt bound to follow the majority of the Full Bench of his High Court. <sup>(12)</sup>

It is submitted that the view taken in the Bombay case is unsound and opposed to the inherent rights of the grandson.

1431. Minor co-parcener.—The right of the minor co-parcener to call for his share has been modified by considerations for his own welfare. It is presumed that a minor's welfare can best be looked after by his dear and near relations who are bound to him by ties of affection and relationship. It was consequently laid down by Sir Thomas Strange in his manual of Hindu Law that where there was no evidence of malversation, no court would sever a minor's share as a matter of course on a suit being filed on his behalf by his next friend. This view has since been adopted and followed in several cases. <sup>(13)</sup>

1432. It will be seen in the sequel that in the absence of prejudice, a minor will be bound by a partition decree though he was not represented in the suit. (1)

1433. Illegitimate son.—Since only co-parceners are entitled to enforce partition the question whether an illegitimate son possesses that right depends upon his right in the family. It is settled that the illegitimate sons of the three regenerate castes are entitled to nothing beyond maintenance "if they be docile", (2)

1434. But in the case of a Shudra the question has not been quite settled. The rights of a Shudra's son are thus defined in the texts:—

Yajñavalkya.—Even a son begotten by a Shudra on a female slave may take a share by the father's choice. But if the father be dead, the brethren should make him partaker of the moiety of a share and one who has no brother may inherit the whole property in default of a daughter or daughter's son. (3)

Mitākshara:—2. The son begotten by a Shudra on a female slave, obtaining a share by the father's choice, or at his pleasure. But after the demise of the father, if there be sons of a wedded wife, let these brothers allow the son of the female slave to participate for half a share; that is let them give him half a share; that is let them give half as much as is the amount of one brother's allotment. However, should there be no sons of a wedded wife, the son of the female slave takes the whole estate provided there be no daughters of a wife, nor sons of daughters. But if there be such, the son of the female slave participates for half a share only. (4)

1435. Following this text it has been held that a Dasiputra of a Shudra has no right of partition against his father, since as against his father he has no vested right though on his death he could enforce a partition as against his legitimate brothers, (5) unless they received the estate by a transfer from their father during his life-time in which case the illegitimate son cannot enforce his right against his father's transferee, though he be his legitimate brother. (6)

1436. Adopted son.—It has already been stated that an adopted son is as regards his rights indistinguishable from an Auras son though the quantum of interest is reduced in competition, with him (§§ 809-811). The adopted son of a son when an exclusive heir, succeeds to his grandfather's estate like a natural grandson. But in competition between the son and the adopted son of a predeceased natural son, the grandson by adoption does not take the share of his father but only the share which his father would have taken if he had himself been an adopted son. (7) Where a co-parcener dies and his widow makes an adoption after partition, the adopted son would be entitled to call upon the other co-parceners to make over to him a portion of the wealth equal to that which would have been taken by his father. (8) It was so held by the Privy Council in a case decided upon the following facts. An impartible Zamindari, the property of two undivided brothers, was in the possession of the elder. On his death, leaving a widow and no male issue, the brother became entitled by survivorship to the entire estate. The widow made a valid adoption to her husband and it was held that the adopted son was entitled to possession of the Zamindari. (1)

1437. Disqualified heir.—An heir disqualified from inheritance is equally disqualified to enforce or take a share in a partition but the disqualification is personal while it lasts. If then a co-parcener was excluded from participation by reason of his disqualification, its subsequent removal would entitle him to his share which he may claim from his quondam co-parceners.<sup>(8)</sup> On the other hand if his disability was not congenital, then his interest which became vested in him on his birth could not be divested by his subsequent disability. So a co-parcener who became a lunatic subsequent to his birth can during his lunacy maintain a suit for partition of his share in the joint property. He has vested rights in such property by birth, which are not divested by his subsequent lunacy. (2) It will be seen when discussing the laws of inheritance, as has been remarked before (§ 1105), that a disqualification from inheritance is a personal disqualification which only affects the person disqualified and not his heirs; from which it follows that the son or grandson of such person, if not himself disqualified, is competent to claim partition. It is immaterial if he was born after the death of his disqualified ancestor. (3) Even if he was born after partition he will divest those in whom it has vested before his birth.

1438. Minor co-parcener.—The right of a minor co-parcener to claim partition has already been considered (§ 1388). The fact that the co-parcenary comprises some minors is no obstacle to a partition. As the Privy Council observed: "There is no doubt that a valid agreement for partition may be made during the minority of one or more of the co-parceners. That seems to follow from the admitted right of one co-parcener to claim a partition; and (as has been said) if an agreement for partition could not be made binding on minors, a partition could hardly ever take place. No doubt if the partition was unfair or prejudicial to the minor's interests, he might, on attaining his majority, by proper proceedings set it aside so far as regards himself." (4) The interest of the minor would of course, be protected by his natural guardian and in his absence by his de facto guardian. (5) On coming of age the partition of his nonage binds him unless he can shew that it was a fraud upon his rights, or that it was made to his conscious prejudice. The mere fact that it was unequal would not by itself vitiate the partition arrangement.

1439 Absent co-parcener.—The position of an absent co-parcener is like that of minors, idiots and other disqualified persons. As Sir Thomas Strange said: "Upon the same footing, in this respect, with minors are absentees, residing in a foreign country, whose consent at the time not being obtainable, partition may proceed without it, the law enjoining the preservation of their respective shares, till the one arrives at majority, and the other returns; and this in the case of the latter, to the extent of the seventh in descent, the right of parceners remaining at home, being lost by dispossession beyond the fourth." (1) This view was reiterated by a Full Bench of the Madras court who said: "Again, let the eldest son B have gone to a foreign country and let his brothers in his absence make a partition of the family wealth; a share is not necessarily set apart for him; the time may have elapsed when it may reasonably be believed he was dead. According to Hindu Law which does not in other cases ignore limitation, he may after seven generations, return and claim to have a share or a half share made up to him out of his brother's allotments." (2)

1440. After born son.—Under Hindu Law a child is presumed to come into existence from the moment of its conception. Consequently where partition is effected while a co-parcener was in the womb, on his birth he becomes entitled to a share which he may claim by reopening the partition. (3)

1441. But if the partition was completed before his conception he has no right against his separated brothers. So where the father of three sons, two of whom were minors made a partition giving his eldest son a third of the estate, retaining the other two thirds himself on behalf of his two younger sons by his younger wife and five years after, another son was born to him by her, who sued the father and his three sons by the senior wife for a general partition claiming a fourth share of the entire estate, the court rejected his claim against the separated son adding: "The general rule of Hindu Law, as expounded by the Mitakshara, Mayukh and the Smritichandrika is that a son born after partition has no claim on the wealth of his separated brothers. He has a preferential claim on the wealth of his parents. He can have a share of it with those brothers who lived in union with the father or were reunited with him. The separated brothers have no claim over this distributed parental share. A partition is limited to the interests of the person demanding it, and has no enforced general operation against those who desire to live in union."

"The somewhat vague texts of Vishnu and Yajnavalkya which direct separated brothers to give a share to an after-born son, apply to sons who have no provision made for them and have further been explained by commentators as applicable only to the case of posthumous sons. In the present case there has been no partition between the brothers. The father only cut off one of his sons with a separate provision, and retained the rest of the property in his own charge and management for the sons of his younger wife. All branches of the family gave effect to this understanding for twelve years. His claim can only be made against respondents Nos. 2 and 3 who lived with their father in union and with whom he himself has been all along living as a member of a joint family". (4)

1442. This case then establishes the rule that where the father separates only some of his sons, remaining joint with the rest of his family an after-born son must look to this family for his share. He cannot make any claim against his separated kinsman unless his separation was a fraud on his right.

1443. The case is again not different even where there has been a general partition between the father and his sons, provided the father takes his legitimate share. The after-born son cannot then enforce a re-partition of the whole estate but must take his share from his father's allotment.

Co-widow's right to partition.

135. (1) A co-widow is entitled to the partition of her life-interest in her husband's estate.

(2) But such partition is not absolute and does not in the absence of an express agreement to the contrary, determine her co-parcenary right of survivorship.

1444. Analogous Law.—This section deals with the interest which the co-widows acquire in their husband's estate by inheritance. As such they are in the strictest sense co-parceners (1) possessing the right of survivorship to each other. As such, partition being an incident of the co-parcenary right of co-widows they should prima facie be entitled to claim the right of partition which they do. But since their interest in their husband's property is limited it follows that partition in their case must be necessarily modified by the nature of their interest in their husband's inheritance and the reversionary rights of others who are entitled to see that their interest is not prejudiced by the destruction or waste committed by the life holders or their transferees. Again since the partition of the interest of co-widows is not allowable, it follows that partition can only affect their mode of possession and enjoyment and cannot alter their title. In other words the partition to which the co-widows are entitled is the partition merely of their life-estate which is their right to possession and enjoyment (2) and this right belongs to all female heirs such as daughters (3) inheriting to their father. (4) Neither co-widows nor daughters can by their alienation alter the character of their qualified estate so far as concerns the right of survivorship or the rights of reversioners, but they may alienate their interests in the property or have that interest taken and sold in execution of a decree against them. They may also, subject to the same condition, demand a partition of the property. When their interests are transferred, it is obviously desirable that the transferees should be able to partition their transferor's interest.

(4) Kanni Ammal v. Ammakannu, 28 M. 504.

1446. Under the Mitakshara as well as both under Mayukh, and the Dayabhag <sup>(4)</sup> it is the right of each of the co-widows to enjoy her deceased husband's property by partition inter se. She can assign her right to any one she chooses. If he has already obtained the share by partition she can alienate her interest in that share. But the assignment or alienation cannot take effect or have validity beyond her life-time. It is good so long as she lives. On her death her interest in property ceases and the share goes to the surviving co-widow or co-widows as the case may be. <sup>(5)</sup> A co-widow is entitled to partition even if she has no more than a possessory title. So where on the death of their husband, his two co-widows took possession of the estate left by him. The deceased had before his death, adopted a boy, to whom also he bequeathed his property by will. The boy however, died soon after the testator. The High Court dismissed the suit holding that the widows could not enforce partition of their possessory title, but on appeal the Privy Council held that a possessory title was sufficient to support a claim for partition. <sup>(6)</sup> The fact that after the death of her husband the widow was leading an immoral life is no ground for refusing her partition. As a matter of fact the court has no discretion in the matter. <sup>(7)</sup>

1447. But the partition to which co-widows are entitled is not an absolute partition destroying their right of survivorship to each other. As the Privy Council observed: "Two or more lawfully married wives take a joint estate for life in the husband's property, with rights of survivorship and equal beneficial enjoyment." <sup>(8)</sup> As to the mode of enjoyment, it has no doubt been decided <sup>(9)</sup> that widows taking a joint interest in the inheritance of their husbands have no right to enforce an absolute partition of the joint estate between them." <sup>(10)</sup> Their Lordships then went to cite cases to shew that though they could not enforce an absolute partition, they could nevertheless obtain separate possession and enjoyment of their shares leaving the title to each share unaffected and that such qualified partition did not destroy their co-parcenary right of survivorship.

1448. The principle applicable to co-widows would apply equally to two or more sisters inheriting to their father. (1)

1449. The donee of a co-widow may equally enforce the same right of partition which belonged to his donor.<sup>(2)</sup> But since this partition is only of the life estate it should not be made so as to prejudice the rights of the reversioners who are entitled to inheritance, if the partition is prejudicial to their rights, as where it would lead to waste or otherwise be injurious to the corpus.

1450. While the quasi partition to which co-widows are entitled does not destroy the co-parcenary, there is nothing to prevent them by express agreement between themselves to put an end to their right of survivorship. (3) But this again cannot prejudice the reversioners.

Female shares on partition.

136. Subject to any local law or usage to the contrary, the following female relations are each entitled to a share on partition:—

(1) On a partition between the father and his sons, or between the sons, their mother and their grandmother are entitled to a share which with the stridhan received from their husband or the father-in-law must equal a son's share.

(2) And unmarried daughters are entitled to quarter of a son's share.

(3) On a partition between her sons or grandsons a widow is entitled to a share equal to that of a son's son.

Exception.—The wife or the widow in Southern India is allotted no share.

1451. Analogous Law.—The last section deals with persons who are entitled to claim and if necessary, enforce a partition of their share by suit. This section deals with the female members who are allotted a share on a partition being made, though they have no right to demand or enforce a partition.

Their right is subject to local law and usage.

Texts.

1452. The following texts bear on the subject of women's share on partition:—

Yajnavalkya :—If he (the father) makes the allotments equal, his wives to whom no separate property has been given by the husband, or the father-in-law, must be rendered partakers of like portions <sup>(1)</sup>

Of heirs dividing after the death of the father let the mother also take an equal share. <sup>(2)</sup>

But sisters should be disposed of in marriage, giving them as an allotment, the fourth part of a brother's own share. <sup>(3)</sup>

Mitakshara :—10. When the father by his own choice makes all his sons partakers of equal portions, his wives to whom peculiar property had not been given by their husband or by their father-in law, must be made participants of shares equal to those of sons. But if separate property has been given to a woman the author subsequently directs half a share to be allotted to her; or if any had been given, let him assign the half.

11. But if he give the superior allotment to the eldest son and distribute similar unequal shares to the rest, his wives do not take such portions, but receive equal shares of the aggregate from which the son's deductions have been subtracted besides their own appropriate deductions specified by Apastamb. The furniture in the house and her ornaments are the wife's property. <sup>(4)</sup>

1. When a distribution is made during the life of the father, the participation of his wives, equally with his sons, has been directed "If he make the allotments equal, his wives must be rendered partakers of like portions." The author now proceeds to declare their equal participation, when the separation takes place after the demise of the father: "Of heirs dividing after the death of the father let the mother also take an equal share". <sup>(5)</sup>

2. Of heirs separating after the decease of the father the mother shall take a share equal to that of a son's, provided no separate property had been given to her. But, if any property had been given to her, she is entitled to half a share as will be explained.

5. In regard to unmarried sisters, the author states a different rule. "But sisters should be disposed of in marriage giving them as an allotment, the fourth part of a brother's own share." <sup>(6)</sup>

6. The purport of the passage is this: "Sisters also who are not already married must be disposed of in marriage by brethren contributing a fourth part of their own allotments. Hence it appears that daughters also participate after the death of their father. Here in saying "of a brother's own share" the meaning is not that a fourth part shall be deducted out of the portions allotted to each brother, and shall be so contributed but that the girl shall be allowed to participate for a quarter of such a share as would be assignable to a brother of the same rank with herself. The sense expressed is this. If the maiden be daughter of a Brahmani she has a quarter of so much as is the amount of an allotment for a son by a Brahmani wife.

14. Therefore, after the decease of the father, an unmarried sister participates in the inheritance. But before his demise she obtains that only, whatever it be, which her father gives since there is no special precept respecting this case. This all is unexceptionable. <sup>(7)</sup>

Dayabhag :—When participation is made by brethren of the whole blood after the demise of the father an equal share must be given to the mother. For the text expresses. <sup>(8)</sup> "The mother should be made an equal sharer." <sup>(9)</sup>

Since the term mother intends the natural parent, it cannot also mean a step mother. For a word employed once cannot bear the literal and metaphorical senses at the same time.

The equal participation of the mother with the brethren takes effect, if no separate property had been given to the woman. But, if any have been given, she has half (a share). And if the father make an equal partition among his sons all the wives (who have no issue) equally share with the sons. So Yajñavalkya declares: 'If he make the allotments equal, his wives to whom no separate property has been given by their husband, or their father-in-law, must be rendered partakers of like portions.' To a woman, whose husband marries a second wife, let him give an equal sum, as a compensation for the supersession, provided no separate property have been bestowed on her but if any have been assigned let him allot half (1)

Unmarried daughters, likewise following the allotments of sons, take a quarter thereof. Thus Brihaspati says "Mothers are equal sharers with them : and daughters are entitled to a fourth part" (2)

Mayukh.—In case of equal partition between a father and his sons, a share to the wife is also spoken of by Yajñavalkya, (3) "If he make the allotment equal his wives to whom no stridhan has been given by the husband or the father-in-law, must be made partakers of equal portions." But if any has been given, one-half is to be given, for (the text is) "if any has been given one half should be assigned"; ardham (one half) meaning so much as should make, with what has been given before as stridhan, a share equal to a son's share. (4) But if her wealth be already in excess of such a share, no share should be given her. (5)

1453. As regards the rights of unmarried daughters and sisters the texts
01. (2). uniformly allow them a share on partition equivalent to one-fourth of the son's share. (6) The leading text on the subject is that of Manu's, commenting on which Jagannath says: "The text of Manu is thus interpreted: the fourth part of the shares which are allotted to brothers of the same class with the sister shall be computed; and deducting that sum, in due proportion, out of their own several shares, the brothers shall give it as a portion to the unmarried daughters. It is directed that a fourth part of a share shall be given, and that allotment according to Chandeshwar is merely intended to defray the expenses of the nuptial ceremony. Others hold, that so much only shall be given as is sufficient, to accomplish the sacrament or marriage. On this subject Jinut Vahan remarks, that if the estate be considerable, a sufficient sum for the nuptial ceremony shall be given; and a fourth part of a share is not positively directed. This must be understood where the number of daughters and sons is equal. If the number be unequal, a large sum is thus given to the daughters, and the sons are altogether deprived of their shares. Nor can this be proper for the son is pre-eminent. A fourth part of the share must be given to sisters; but if they be twice or thrice as numerous, they would receive a greater sum than their brothers, if they be four times as numerous, the brothers would be deprived of their shares; if they be five times as numerous, the case would be very puzzling. Yet such a case may occur. The rule for giving a quarter of a share cannot therefore be received without exception. In fact the rule only bears that a brother shall give a fourth part if he have a considerable allotment. But if sisters be few in number compared with the number of brothers, or if there be no brothers, another rule of Vishnu must be adduced. "The marriage and other ceremonies of

Else so much only should be given as will make her allotment equal to the son's" cited per Macpherson, J. in Jodonnath v. Brojonnath, 12 B. L. R. 385 (389, 390); Jagannath:—"Moiety" (ardham) in the masculine gender signifies part in general not equal parts or exact half which is signified by the same word in the neuter gender.

unmarried daughters must be defrayed in proportion to the wealth inherited." (1)

1454. Similarly the quarter share is held in the Mithila country to mean the expenses of marriage. (2)

The right of the wives to a share has been recognized in a long series of cases. (8)

1455. The right of unmarried daughters to participate in a partition is considered in the texts only when there is a division between the sons. (4) But her share is generally taken to be one fourth of that of a son.

The cases have now settled most of these rights which will therefore be now examined.

1456. Wife's share on partition.—The right of the wife, the mother, or the grandmother to a share on partition is recognized by all the schools as will be manifest from the texts already cited. She is not the owner of any share and cannot therefore claim a portion. (5) A share is given to her for no other purpose than as a provision for her maintenance. She has no right to ask for maintenance after she has got such a share, and if a partition is effected after her death her heirs can make no claim to her share. As was observed by Mitter, J. in a case, "The mother or grandmother as the case might be, is entitled to a share, when sons or grandsons divide the family estate between themselves. But the mother or the grandmother can never be recognized as the owner of such a share, until the division has been actually made. She has no pre-existing vested right in the estate except a right of maintenance. She may acquire property by partition, for partition is one of the recognized modes of acquiring property under the Hindu Law. But partition in her case is the sole cause of her right to the property. It follows therefore, that the effect cannot precede the cause". (6) The right of the mother is a latent and inchoate right which becomes effective when separation takes place. (7)

Cl. (1) Share of the wife or mother.

son". (1) That is to say if there be three sons, the property, would in an ordinary case, be divided into four shares of which one would go to the mother. (2) But where the mother has already received some property from her husband or her father-in-law then she entitled to only so much as will give her a share equal to the share of a son. And if the property received by her is more than such a share she will receive nothing on partition. (3) The mother can claim such share not only quod the sons, but even as against an auction purchaser of one of her son's interest. (4) The property which the mother might have inherited or acquired otherwise than from her husband and father-in-law does not affect her share. (5)

1458. The mother under the Bengal law is entitled to the same share. (6)

1459. And it has been held that the same right belongs to the step mother since the term "wives" in the Mitakshara text (7) must necessarily include step mothers. (8)

1460. Grandmother.—The grandmother's right to the same share as the mother in a partition between her sons and grandsons has been admitted in several cases (9) but the contrary has been held in Allahabad in a case of partition between the father and his sons, (10) the court refraining from expressing any opinion as to what would be her right on a partition between her grandsons on the death of the son, though it was inclined to the view that she would be entitled to a share. It was however, said that during her son's own life-time the mother of the father should look to her own son for support and maintenance. (11) The view proceeds upon the literal reading of the Mitakshara text before cited (12) in which on a partition between the father and his sons only his "wives" are allotted a share.

1461. The unmarried daughter or sister.—The texts all favour the rights of the daughter and the sister to share at partition and this has been recognized in several cases, (13) and in the view of text writers. (14) A Hindu Judge referring to the subject said: "The texts I have referred to all prescribe the rule in the case of a partition among brothers. They do not deal specially with a case where there is only one brother and one or more sisters. But looking to the spirit pervading them and the object they are meant to conserve, it is clear that what holds good in the former case must hold good in the latter as well. To hold the contrary would be to make the undoubted and well recognized right of sisters depend on an accidental circumstance entirely lacking in relevancy to the question of her right as a member of a joint family". (1)

1462. Local usage.—It is said that the widow or mother in Southern India is in practice never allotted her share in a partition. (2) This view is maintained in the Smritichandrika (3) the correctness of which is however disputed in the Madhaviya. (4) It has been held that the view of Nanda Pandit that the right of a mother to a share is not a right of heritage but a right to a provision has become established law in the Madras Presidency. (5)

1463. In this view account is to be taken of property which she has already received and if it is insufficient for her maintenance, an allotment is to be made to her so as to provide her with a sufficiency for her wants, which allotment could never be in excess of a son's share but which would be less than a son's share if the property was so large that a son's share would more than suffice for her needs. (6)

When partition refused 137. A person otherwise entitled to partition may be disqualified from enforcing it for any of the following reasons :—

- (a) If he has entered into a valid agreement against it.
- (b) If the property is subject to a family arrangement.
- (c) If the parties have already become otherwise separate.
- (d) If he has relinquished his share in the joint property.

1464 Analogous Law.—It has already been stated that Manu and other law givers commend partition as multiplying religious duties. (7) They do not encourage jointness. Nor does the modern law.

A partition may, however, be postponed though it cannot be prevented by an agreement inter partes. Such agreement does not bind any but those entering into it. It may also be more effectively prevented by a family arrangement or an implied partition. The subject of family arrangement has already,

1465. Agreement against partition.—There is some conflict between the decided cases, more apparent than real, as to the validity of an agreement against partition. There can be no doubt that the parties cannot by agreement make a partible estate impartible, since impartibility must arise out of a special tenure or a general family or local custom. (2) Moreover, an agreement never to divide certain property would be invalid on the ground that it tends to create a perpetuity. (3) As Phear, J. said: "It is not competent for the owners of a property in this country by any arrangement made in their own discretion to alter the ordinary incidents of the property which they possess, for instance, in this particular case, to say that the joint property shall remain the joint property of the joint family in perpetuity, but shall not possess the incident which the law of the country attaches to property in such condition, namely, that every independent parcener is entitled at any time to have his share divided off from the rest. No doubt any member of the family, and therefore, all might, for sufficient consideration bind themselves to forego their rights for a specified time and definite purpose, by a contract which could be enforced against them personally." (4) As was observed in another case: "The right of a co-owner to have partition of his share is incident to the right of ownership, and an agreement not to partition for an indefinite period would be contrary to that right, and therefore not enforceable." (5)

In other words, an agreement against partition is unenforceable even as between the immediate parties to it, unless it is supported by consideration and is otherwise reasonable and proper and intended for the beneficial enjoyment of the joint property. Even then the agreement does not bind the heirs and assignees of the parties. (6) This appears to be the dominant note of several cases. (7)

1467. Family arrangement.—This has already been the subject of previous discussion (S. 130).

1468 Separation.—There remains the question of a previous separation, which may be express or implied. As this raises a question of some importance and is of frequent occurrence it forms the subject of the next section.

1469. Relinquishment.—It is open to a co-parcener to relinquish his interest in the joint property. This he may do if he finds it overburdened with debts or otherwise subject to obligations which he may not care to face.

So where the father of three sons had incurred considerable expense for the marriage of two of his sons for which he sold some of his properties, gave them some cash and jewels and separated them from the family. The sons thereafter lived separately while the father and the son lived together. It was held that the transaction was a relinquishment by the separated sons of their interest in the remaining family properties. <sup>(1)</sup>

Partial partition.

138. (1) Partition may be general or partial. <sup>(2)</sup>

(2) Partition is general where all members join in partitioning their joint property.

(3) It is partial when some of them separate, leaving the rest joint; or where all divide only some of their joint property.

(4) Partial partition cannot be made otherwise than by the agreement of parties, except where it is otherwise indispensable or would be equitable or convenient to the parties without prejudice to the rights of the co-parcenary.

(5) Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing general rule such partition may be permitted in the following cases :—

- (i) Where partial partition is permitted by any other law.
- (ii) Where different portions of the family property are situate in different districts. <sup>(3)</sup>
- (iii) Where the portion excluded is impartible. <sup>(4)</sup>
- (iv) Where the portion excluded has already been partitioned or is the subject of a family arrangement.
- (v) Where the portion excluded is not in the possession of co-parceners. <sup>(5)</sup>
- (vi) Where the portion excluded is held jointly with a stranger who has no interest in the family partition. <sup>(6)</sup>
- (vii) Where the defendant has no interest in the portion excluded.

1470. Analogous Law.—Hindu Law does not contemplate a partial partition. It contemplates either a complete jointness or a complete severance of joint interest. (1) It has no place for an intermediate stage in which some persons and property remain joint while the rest separate. (2) But such a state is both practical and possible though it cannot be demanded as of right. (3) As West and Buhler observe: "Though partial division is of very frequent occurrence in practice, the law books do not contain any special rules on the subject." (4) The law of partial partition is then based upon general principles and actual decisions which will be presently considered.

Partial partition may, it is said, be demanded as of right by the alienee of a co-parcenary interest who may either sue for the separation of his share in a general partition or only take proceedings to have it ascertained in partition. (5)

1471. Partial partition.—It has already been stated that Hindu Law contemplates a complete partition. It does not contain any rules for a partial partition which owes its recognition to general principles and the decided cases which have always refused to make a partial partition at the instance of one co-parcener against others; nor is the rule confined to co-parcenary property. Even where the parties are only co-sharers or tenants in common, partition of certain of the items only has been ordinarily refused (1) though if it could be effected without much inconvenience to other sharers, a partial partition has not been held to be absolutely barred. (2) As was observed in a case : "A member of a joint family cannot, any more than a partner, introduce a stranger into the community ; he cannot for his own benefit alienate or deliver to a stranger a particular portion of the common property without winding up the concern ; and his interest is, therefore, a right to a share of the general assets after the common liabilities have been discharged, and not a right to a share of any specific property of the family. It has accordingly been frequently held that his remedy is a suit for the partition of the whole family property, and not of specific property." (3)

1472. In this view even a purchaser of a co-parcenary interest is When permitted. not entitled to have his interest ascertained except in a proceeding for a general partition. This view proceeds on the ground that "since the transferee only acquires an equity to compel a partition he has only a right in personam and not a right in rem and the transferor remains a member of the family and retains all the rights which attach to membership, including the right to an increased share upon the death of another co-parcener. An alienation by a co-parcener of a particular item of the family property or of a specific share in such an item, differs in some respects from an alienation of the whole or a fraction of the interest of the transferor in the general assets of the family. Since a member of a joint family has no right to a specific share of any particular property of the family, an assignment by him of such a share to a stranger conveys no interest whatever to the transferee. If however, the grantor should subsequently become entitled to the property included in the grant, then on a well settled principle of equity which is embodied in S. 43 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, he cannot deny the title to the transferee and is bound to make the grant effectual. The courts have in this case also recognized the right of the transferee to stand in the shoes of the transferor and to enforce his equity by means of a suit for the general partition of the entire family property, and in order to do equity as between the transferor and transferee, will endeavour to marshal the property in such a way as, if possible, to give effect to the alienation; but this is in order to avoid a fraud upon the transferee, and this procedure will not be adopted to the prejudice of the other co-parceners." (4)

1473. The other view has been maintained by a Full Bench of the same court which while refusing a partial partition to a co-parcener, permits it to a stranger alienee. (5) In so holding the court followed the dicta of the Privy Council in which their Lordships held the alienee of a share "entitled to take proceedings to have it ascertained in partition." (6) But in all these cases their Lordships were merely indicating the alienee's right and were not prescribing the procedure. In any case, as pointed out by the same court in another case the alienee being clearly entitled to the equity the fact that he sues for a partial partition should not be fatal to his suit. The other co-parceners might be given notice and if they should prefer a general partition it should be decreed. The rule applicable to such cases is that governing partition between tenants in common and not that regulating partition between members of an undivided family. (1)

1474. The true rule appears to be that while the purchaser has no right to maintain a partial partition as held in some cases (2) his right is to have his share ascertained and he is entitled to sue for no more than the ascertainment of his share. If it then appears that this cannot be done without a general partition the court should order it without driving the purchaser to another suit. (3) This course may be necessary if there are equities which the other co-parceners have against the alienor which can only be worked out in a general suit for partition and in working out those equities, the plaintiff's vendor, and hence the plaintiff may be assigned a different item from the item he purported to buy or even a smaller share than those items represented. (4)

There are no doubt cases in which the court has dismissed a suit for partial partition holding it untenable, (5) there are those in which such suit was allowed (6) while there are others in which the court is guided by equity and convenience. (7)

1475. Partial partition between co-parceners.—It has already been stated that co-parceners cannot claim a partition partial as to the persons or the property as of right, though such partitions are sanctioned by usage and may be decreed by consent. (8) Apart from suit, it may be made by arrangement.

But apart from consent or compromise, the court will not entertain a suit for a partial partition (9) unless some properties being previously partitioned, the suit relates only to those which remained undivided (10) or where some of the property is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, or where some of it is in the possession of the mortgagee or some other party and is therefore not available for partition. The rule on the subject of partial partition between co-parceners has been thus stated: "Though there can be no compulsory partial partition either in respect of the joint property belonging to the family, or in respect of the persons constituting the undivided family, yet by mutual agreement of parties the partition can be partial either in respect of the property or of the persons constituting the family. And according to usage and custom the remaining members of an undivided family from which one or more have become divided, continue as an undivided family in its normal state and not as members, who after partition have become reunited." (1)

1476. The separation of some members from the joint family has not necessarily the effect of operating as a general partition, though for the purpose of ascertaining the share of the outgoing member it is necessary to ascertain the share of every co-parcener and in fact to effect a general imaginary partition. (2)

This fact supports the presumption that a partition is general both as to the person and the property. (3) But it is merely a presumption and may be disproved by proving the contrary.

There is no presumption that where some only of the members separate, the rest remain joint. An agreement among the remaining co-parceners to remain united or to reunite must be proved like any other fact. (4) As their Lordships said: "It appears to their Lordships that there is no presumption when one co-parcener separates from the others, that the latter remain united. In many cases it may be necessary, in order to ascertain the share of the outgoing member, to fix the shares which the other co-parceners are or would be entitled to, and in this sense the separation of one is said to be a virtual separation of all. And their Lordships think that an agreement amongst the remaining members of a joint family to remain united or to reunite must be proved like any other fact." (5) It must be noted that this case is no authority for the proposition that the separation of one member leads to a separation of all. All it says and means is that the separation of a single member destroys the presumption that the family is joint and that the remaining members cannot be presumed to remain joint. Whether they do so in fact must be proved like any other fact.

1477. Case for partial partition.—A case for partial partition arises where all the co-parceners have alienated their interests, in which case the alienee from one may sue the alienee from the rest for the severance of his share without a general partition. (6)

1478. Partial partition allowed by other law.—The rule against partial partition is now a mere processual law. It is dictated by considerations of convenience and has not been adhered to in certain classes of cases in which apparently it was considered to lead to inconvenience. (1) But this does not mean that partial partition should be permitted as a matter of course. All it means is that the rule is not inflexible but is subject to well defined exceptions the scope of which should not be enlarged except upon grounds of manifest convenience. (2)

1479. The rule of Hindu Law against a partial partition has been in several respects modified by the statute law relating to the partition of property. For instance special provision is made in the various Land Revenue Acts for the partition of revenue paying estates, of which partition can only be made as therein provided. (3) Ordinarily these Acts recognize a Mahal as a unit for partition and it may then be partitioned, though the family may own several mahals of which piecemeal partition is reprobated by Hindu Law. (4) Then again, partial partition may be rendered necessary by the limited local jurisdiction of the court. Where therefore only some of the property is situate within the local jurisdiction of the court it would entertain a suit for partition of it though it may not comprise the entire estate. Such a case may arise whether some property is situate outside British India, or outside the local jurisdiction of a district court. (5) The same rule extends to the High Courts which are however, empowered, on leave being obtained, to entertain a suit in respect of all properties situate within and without their ordinary original jurisdiction (6) provided that some property is situate within the jurisdiction of the court. (7) Where a suit related to the partition of both moveable and immoveable property the latter being situate wholly beyond the jurisdiction of the High Court, the court will refuse partition as to the immoveable estate which lay beyond it. (8)

1480. If it is, however, necessary for the purpose of doing complete justice between the parties that a suit should be stayed pending the institution of a suit in the court within whose jurisdiction the immoveable property is situate, it would adopt that course. (9) The court has no jurisdiction to grant leave for trial of a partition suit where all the immoveable property is situate beyond its jurisdiction. So where the plaintiff sued for partition of his share in the family property comprising both moveables and immoveables of which the former were situate within and the latter without the jurisdiction of the court, and the Registrar granted leave for trial of the whole suit, in the High Court, it was held that the High Court had no jurisdiction as to the lands and that the leave to sue had been improperly granted by the Registrar. The suit as to the lands was accordingly dismissed. (10)

1481. Where it is indispensable.—Again, partial partition is the only course possible where the rest of the property is in the

CI. (5) (2). possession of the mortgagee and is therefore not available for present division. (1) In one case it was suggested that where it is so it is still open to the plaintiff to sue for a division of right, though he could not obtain its partition by metes and bounds. But the court held that the plaintiff being entitled to possession on partition cannot be compelled to sue for only a portion of the relief to which he is entitled. (2)

1482. Where co-parcener affirms alienation.—Where the right, title

CI. (5) (3). and interest of a member of a joint Hindu family in specific family property is sold in execution of a decree not binding on the remaining co-parcener, it is competent to such other co-parcener if he chooses to affirm the court sale in respect of that portion of the property, and thus become divided in respect of such portion only of the family property, in which case the purchaser is not driven to the necessity of enforcing his purchase by bringing a suit for a general partition of the whole of the family property. A joint family consisted of a father A a son B and the latter's son C. In execution of a decree against B for purposes not binding on A, B's interest in a specific portion of the joint property was sold. Subsequently, A gifted his moiety in such portion in favour of C who sued the purchaser to recover such specific moiety. It was held that the father by making a gift of his moiety had in effect ratified the court sale as effecting a partition of the property to which the sale related, between himself and his son under whom the purchaser claimed. The gift was really one made by a member of an undivided family who had become divided in respect of a portion of the family property, a moiety of which was the subject of the gift. Such a gift was valid. As regards C he was entitled not merely to joint possession with the purchaser but to the sole possession of the specific half claimed if the specific half claimed was in excess of the fair half. (3)

1483. The same view has been taken in other cases which proceed upon the principle that though a co-parcener is entitled to enforce a general partition, still it is only his right and he may choose to forego the advantage. Where therefore, a stranger has acquired a co-parcener's interest in a specific property it is for the other co-parceners to affirm or interdict the act and claim by partition to recover from the stranger the property to which the alienation cannot extend. (4)

1484. Such a course is inevitable, since the stranger is not interested in a general partition and the co-parcener does not want it either. So where one of two brothers sold his interest in a house and three shops to the defendant, whereupon the other brother sued him for their partition but the purchaser resisted the suit on the ground that a suit for partial partition was untenable the court overruled the contention holding that the purchaser was not interested in the rest of the property and the vendor was entitled to the separation of his moiety from that sold off by his brother. (1)

1486. Suit between stranger alienees.—The same principle justifies a suit for partial partition between two stranger alienees of co-parcenary interests who being each interested only in the specific item of property acquired by him cannot create disruption of the joint family. (4) In such case each purchaser is only entitled to work out the rights, which he has acquired by his purchase. The purchase of either vendee does not give him an equitable right to a marshalling of the parts of the estate in his favour. (5)

The same rule extends to the partition of a property held by a joint family in partnership with a stranger who has no interest in a general partition of the family estate and who could not therefore be made a party in the family partition suit. (6)

1487. A suit for partial partition will lie where it is the only property left undivided. Such suit cannot be defeated by a plea that a partial partition cannot be claimed and that the entire property must be again thrown into the hotchpot. (7) "A whole village or a particular community may have a joint property in a right of common pasturage or a forest, and such common enjoyment may continue even after there has been a private partition among the members of any one or more of the component families. No intention to relinquish a part of the claim can be inferred by the mere non-inclusion of such a common claim in a family partition suit." (8) In such case it is clear that a co-parcener may sue for the partition of his right against the other co-parceners and strangers who may be jointly interested in partition. A Vritti was owned jointly by the two families of A and B. In 1881 the Vritti of A was partitioned among its members at the instance of one of its member C who sued the other parceners of the family A and all members of the family B for partition of their joint Vritti. The court held that the first partition did not bar the second and that the latter was not obnoxious to the rule against partial partition. (1)

1488. Other cases may be conceived where a partial partition might be maintained even as between co-parceners. So where some of the property had been previously partitioned, the rest being kept joint, there can be no objection to a suit for the partition of the latter. Nor can such suit be resisted on the ground that the entire estate should be re-partitioned.

1489. Partition of omitted items.—Partial partition is inevitable where it is necessary to complete a general partition. Such a case may arise where some items were omitted or excluded from partition. The same rule would hold good where by inadvertance, mistake, or fraud of any of the parties some item was not brought to partition. (2)

1490. Legal effect of partial partition.—The legal effect of a partial partition is not to break up the co-parcenary altogether, since the members continue to remain co-parceners as regards the undivided property with the right of survivorship inter se as before, the result being that on death of any member the property kept joint would descend not to his own representatives but would survive to the other members. (3)

So where the husband died a separated member leaving some property undivided, his widow was held to have no right to inherit to the latter. (4) But the case would have been different if the title being divided such property was kept joint for enjoyment. (5)

139. In the absence of any contract to the contrary, co-parceners are entitled to shares at partition according to the following rules :—

(1) Each member is presumed to represent himself and his sons whose share is included in the share allotted to him.

(2) Brothers take equal shares ; and the share of a brother who has died is represented by his sons, grandsons and great grandsons.

(3) As between different branches of a family shares are given per stirpes and as between the sons of the same father per capita.

But this rule does not apply to a partial partition.

Texts.

Yajnavalkya :—Among sons by different fathers, the allotment of shares is according to the fathers. <sup>(1)</sup>

Mayukh :—(Quoting the last.) The meaning is that supposing one father to have one son, another two, or third three, the division takes place by the number of the fathers only, not by the number of the shares. <sup>(2)</sup>

Katyayan :—If an undivided younger brother dies, they should make his son a sharer of the inheritance if he has not obtained a livelihood from his grandfather. If should obtain the share of his father from his paternal uncle, or his (i.e) uncles' son. That very share would indeed, be the legal share of all the brothers, or, even his son would receive a share, beyond such a son succession ceases <sup>(3)</sup>

Mayukh —(Quoting the last says.) The word Anuj 'younger brother' is intended to even the elder brother.

Parasar :—(Beyond) means the great grandson. The sons, etc., of the great grandson do not obtain wealth of the great-great-grand father, if the father, grand father, and great grandfather have predeceased such great great grandfather who at his decease has left other sons or other nearer heirs alive. The meaning is that in the absence of sons, grandson, and great grandsons and the like of the deceased, even he (the great grandson) takes. And this does not refer to the undivided but to the reunited, as there is a text of Devala which says "Among family members who having been divided live together the second partition of the heritage takes place (even) up to the fourth in descent. This is the rule." <sup>(4)</sup>

Mitakshara :—This unequal distribution <sup>(5)</sup> supposes property by himself acquired. But of the wealth descended to him from his father an unequal partition at his pleasure is not proper, for equal ownership will be declared. <sup>(6)</sup>

The author next propounds another period of partition for other persons making it, and a rule respecting the mode "Let sons divide equally both the effects and the debts after (the demise of) their two parents." <sup>(7)</sup>

Therefore unequal partition though noticed in codes of law, should not be practised since it is disapproved by the world and is contrary to scripture.

For this reason a restriction is obtained, that brethren should divide only in equal shares <sup>(8)</sup>

Dayabhag —26. It might be argued, that the practice of equal partition is indispensable as the only mode authorized by law. For the brethren may consent to the deductions by reason of great veneration (for the eldest). An option exists like that of making or omitting partition.

27. Accordingly, since persons of the present day (who are younger brothers) entertain no great veneration (for their elders) equal distribution is alone seen in the world; as also because elder brothers deserving of deducted allotments are now rare. <sup>(9)</sup>

1492. The rule stated in the third clause is drawn from the statement of law by Mutusami Ayyar, J. (1)

1493. Partition between brothers.—The simplest case of partition is that by the father among his sons, or by the sons among themselves. In each case all share equally, the archaic law as to the greater share of the eldest son on the ground of primogeniture being now obsolete. It is declared in the texts and has been so held in several cases. (2) The father has no right to make an unequal distribution of his ancestral property, (3) whether moveable (4) or immoveable. It may be that in some localities or families the ancient custom of the right of primogeniture called Jethasi haq still lingers. In one case it was pleaded but the court held the custom not proved. (5)

1494. Now suppose that before the partition some of the brothers were dead. If they left no issue then their shares would naturally devolve on the other co-parceners by survivorship. But if they died leaving issue the latter would take the same share which their father or grandfather would have taken if he were alive. In short they do not take per capita but per stirpes.

But if in the same case the family was subject to the Dayabhog law, then the deceased brother's share would be taken by his heir, devisee or assignee.

If for instance A and B, two brothers, have each two and three sons C and D, and E, F and G, the fact whether C and D separate from their father A and uncle B or whether A, C and D separate from B and his sons would make no difference in the allotment, if at the time of partition either or both the brothers die, since the share of each branch is a moiety and it must be distributed amongst the sons of A and B with the result that while the two sons of A will each get one-fourth, the three sons of B will only get 2/8 each. If B died and with him two of his three sons, then the survivor will get a moiety of his own branch, but if B and his three sons were then alive then they will all get the same moiety. This is division per stirpes, that is a division according to the stocks. (1) If after living separate from A, B wishes to effect a partition amongst his three sons. E, F and G each of them will receive a fourth of the half allotted to B's branch, i.e.,  $\frac{1}{8}$  per head. This is division per capita, i.e., according to the number of the sons, the father being entitled to receive one equal share for himself.

1496. The same rule will extend to the sons and grandsons and great grandsons of E, F and G. But since that is the limit of co-parcenary right, if a person dies leaving him surviving his only great-great-grandson, the latter will take no interest in his ancestor's interest which will pass to his collaterals by survivorship.

1497. Such a case may be imagined in the following illustration. A dies leaving a son B, two grandsons F and G, and a great great-grandson O. Here A's four sons constitute four different branches represented by their descendants but still E's branch takes nothing, since O being more than three degrees remote from the common ancestor is not his coparcener and therefore E's  $\frac{1}{4}$  share in A's estate passes to B, C and D, the two latter being represented by their descendants. A's estate would then be divided into three parts and being taken by B,  $\frac{1}{3}$ rd by F, and G, i.e.,  $\frac{1}{3}$ rd each by F and G and the remaining third by J, K, L and M, (i.e.,  $\frac{1}{12}$ th by each). That is to say while each branch takes per stirpes the individuals of each branch take per capita.

Now in the same case if the partition were made while C and D were both alive then C and D's share would have been the same, but on a fourth division inter se the shares of their descendants would have been correspondingly reduced.

1498. After-born son — Again suppose in the last case that A had made a division amongst his two sons B, and C, and D was born after the partition, what is then D's share? It is now settled that he can receive nothing from his separated brothers B and C (2) if his father had received a share; but if he had reserved nothing for himself then D can claim a repartition from his elder brothers B and C in which case their shares are liable to reduction (3) as previously stated.

1499. Since each father becomes the head of his own branch it follows that there may be branches and sub-branches and while a person may take per stirpes in relation to his own ascendants, he may take per capita in relation to the members of his own branch.

1500. Such a case is imagined in the next illustration. Here suppose all the co-parceners are desirous of effecting a general partition of the estate of A. Now since A left two sons B and C his estate is divisible into two moieties one moiety falling to each branch. Then out of B's moiety his sons and grandsons will each receive  $\frac{1}{4}$  of  $\frac{1}{2} = \frac{1}{8}$ th. And as to C's branch his three sons will each take per stirpes  $\frac{1}{3}$ rd of  $\frac{1}{2} = \frac{1}{6}$ th which will again be subdivided amongst their sons, H and K taking  $\frac{1}{12}$ th each while J's two sons will each receive  $\frac{1}{3}$ rd of  $\frac{1}{6}$ th =  $\frac{1}{18}$ th and J's sons, each  $\frac{1}{4}$ th of  $\frac{1}{6}$ th =  $\frac{1}{24}$ th.

1501. It may however be that some of the members prefer to continue to be joint while the rest desire to separate. In that case division follows the same principle. That is to say, an imaginary partition of all the members is made and the share of each co-parcener ascertained, and the shares of those claiming partition are separated from those continuing to remain joint.

1502. Such a case arose in Madras (1) where the court had to decide upon the following tree.

In 1867 two of C's sons (say G and H) the two sons of E (K and L) and M the son of F sued the rest for partition. For the purpose of that suit the property was divided into twelve shares. Of the six shares due to A's branch, three were allotted to G and H and two to M. The remaining 5 shares were enjoyed in common by the rest of the family C, I and J who remained in union.

In 1872 C died. In 1879 I sued J to recover his share of the family property claiming three-fifths of the whole. The subordinate judge had awarded him only a moiety on the ground that the present state of the family alone was to be considered in ascertaining the shares. But the High Court held that I was entitled to the  $\frac{3}{5}$ ths he had claimed, since the rule that as between different branches division should be per stirpes, and as between sons of the same father per capita applied only to cases of general partition, and had no application to partial partition. Where a joint family in an advanced state of development is broken up by partition, regard must be had to the successive vested interests of each branch, and in order to secure equality of shares division per stirpes at each stage when a new branch intervenes, is necessary. In other words, in such a state of family the members held their shares in quasi-severalty, so that on the death of C, I alone succeeded to his father's share to the exclusion of J whose interest was not enlarged by reason of his jointness with J.

140. (1) Separation may be proved by any declaration, act or conduct of a party entitled to partition showing an intention inconsistent with jointness.

Proof of separation.

(2) In particular and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing rule separation may be presumed from the following facts:—

- (a) Cesser of commensality and joint worship.
- (b) Separate enjoyment of portions of the property, or of their income.
- (c) Division of income.
- (d) Agreement to divide the income in definite shares.
- (e) Separate definement of shares.
- (f) Separate transactions of the co-parceners between themselves with others.

(3) An act of a stranger such as attachment and sale of a co-parcenary interest does not suffice to effect separation.

(4) Conversion of any co-parcener to an alien faith such as Christianity or Mahomedanism has the effect of separating ipso facto the convert from the co-parcenary.

1503. Analogous Law.—It has already been stated before that an unequivocal expression of an intention to separate may amount to partition. (1) In that connection cases have been cited illustrative of the rule, stated in clause (1). "The true test of partition of the property, according to Hindu Law is the intention of the family to become separate owners." (2) If the parties intended to separate but in fact continued to live joint it will be a legal separation. Such was the case of the four joint sharers who drew up a deed by which each was declared as entitled to one-fourth share of the profits of a business and that each would thenceforward contribute one-fourth to the payment of the land revenue which each was to possess to the extent of his share, and it was held that though the co-sharers continued to jointly carry on the business the execution of the deed defining their shares had effected a legal partition. (1) The question in such cases is one of construction. What was the intention of those who submitted to the agreement. Did it merely alter the mode of enjoyment for convenience of management or was it intended to sever the status. Not only the deed but the surrounding circumstances should be taken into consideration. If for instance, there was no immediate necessity for the deed, but nevertheless the parties chose to define their rights it would be strong prima facie evidence to hold the undivided shares as the separate property of each co-partner. (2) The father possesses an absolute right to make a partition during his life and the partition so made binds his sons not because the sons are consenting parties to it but because it is the result of a power conferred on him, though subject to certain restrictions in the interests of his family. A document which purported to be a parikhat (deed of partition) made by a father, by which he reserved a share to himself and said: "There shall hereafter exist between you (sons of the first wife on the one side and those of the second on the other) only a connection of friendship and no connection whatever in respect of property," it was held to be both in form and substance a partition effected by the father in the exercise of his power, though made in his last illness. (3) In another case the father had three sons, one son by his first wife, two sons by his second wife. He executed a will by which he authorized his executors to effect a partition among his sons when the eldest of them attained the age of majority. The executors did so as directed. Properties were divided into the shares, one of which was allotted to the eldest son, and the two shares to the other two sons. The words used in the deed were that "if any property had been left undivided, it would be divided into three shares by the three parties, and in future the parties shall have no connection in respect of property except relationship by blood." It was held that these words effected a severance in interest as between the sons of the second wife also, though their property was kept together without any division. (4) A similar case went up to the Privy Council and was decided on the following facts: The family tree was as given below:—

E and F predeceased C who died in 1882 leaving the grandsons H, I, J, who were all minors. In 1883 the minors H and J applied for a certificate to collect the debts of C alleging that I who was of full age was about to waste the estate of the minors. C opposed this application on the ground that the family was joint. A couple of months later a petition was filed alleging that the parties had arrived at a compromise to which G, H, I and J were all parties. A four-annas share was given to G and out of the remaining twelve annas, three annas had been allotted to I, a three-annas to J and six annas to H. The agreement added: "Now all the parties are at liberty to have their respective names registered in the collectorate jointly or separately and to hold possession of the properties according to their respective proportionate shares. Each party shall have in future no claim of any kind whatever on the ground of the shares being more or less . . . Every one of us has, by virtue of this deed, the power either to continue to live together as members of the joint family as before, or to separate his own business none of us having any objection thereto." The District Judge issued a certificate to all the four cousins to collect debts due to the estate of C and P. After the agreement G separated, but H, I and J continued to live together and collected their income and enjoyed their property in all external respects in the same manner as before the execution of the agreement. H died in 1886 and I in the following year—when the plaintiff who held a mortgage from C, executed in 1869, sued J and the widows of H and I and obtained a decree. But on appeal by J it was held that the mortgage was not proved against him. He then sued the mortgagee and the widows of H and I for recovery of this property to which he claimed to succeed by survivorship alleging his jointness with H and I. The High Court rejected it holding that the agreement had effected a severance J relied upon the last clause in the agreement giving the cousins an option to continue joint as to which the Privy Council replied: "They might elect either to have partition of their shares by metes and bounds, or to continue to live together and enjoy their property in common as before. Whether they did one or the other would affect the mode of enjoyment, but not the tenure of the property or their interest in it."

1504. Their Lordships then adverted to the fact of the co-parceners' minority at the time and added that it too was no impediment to a partition. (1) The father executed a document which he called a will whereby he allotted certain shares of the joint property to his son keeping no share for himself. He, however, added that if he found the sons mismanaging the property he would cancel his deed to make a family arrangement which operated from its date. There was nothing in the deed though it was called a will to postpone its operation and then the threat to cancel the shares was inoperative being in terrorem and did not suffice to prevent the partition operating in presenti. (2)

1505. This view accords with that taken in numerous cases in this country and by the Privy Council. The underlying principle of all these is that if there is an intention to separate, separation may be effected by any overt act, even a declaration or a paper partition, without any change in the mode of living or a division by metes and bounds. On the other hand, there may be a division by metes and bound and no intention to separate; such division though it may be evidence of a family arrangement falls short of a partition. So again a mere declaration to the effect that a certain member is the owner of a particular share, not accompanied by an intention to separate would not constitute a separation of the joint property. (3)

1506. The question then arises how is such an intention to be proved. It is clear that where there is a document, the question of intention is one of construction which may be supported by the evidence of surrounding circumstances and conduct. But if the intention is clear no evidence of conduct is even admissible. Moreover such evidence is only relevant where the deed states that something remains to be done as where it contemplates, the mutation of names, the change of names of the different shops or other consequential acts which the parties treat as essential to complete a partition.

Apart however from deeds, separation may be inferred from acts and conduct enumerated in clause (2).

1507. Cesser of commensality.—Of these, the cesser of commensality and joint worship is important. As the Privy Council said: "Cesser of commensality is an element which may properly be considered in determining the question whether there was partition of joint family property, but it is not conclusive." (1) The evidentiary value of cesser of commensality must naturally depend upon the previous mode of life and occupation of the joint family. In a family possessing properties within a limited area commensality is the rule and cesser an exception. But in a family with numerous members or with scattered possessions it is usual for different members to assume management of different parcels of land which necessitates the cesser of commensality. When a family is large, and is scattered about in different places, it is natural that several members of the family should remain in possession of separate portions of the property for the sake of convenience. Mere separate management cannot give rise to the presumption that the family was divided. (2) So in the trading firms not only is there such cesser, but branch firms carry on independent transactions to all outward appearances and the several branches are even mutually accountable to one another. But they remain still joint, as there is no intention to separate. Whether the cesser was or was not due to separation must then depend upon the circumstances of each case. Even in non-trading families such differences are attributable to the incompatibility of female temperaments. In any case separation cannot be inferred from the mere fact that various members of the family were living in separate houses all of which belonged to the family. (3)

Cl. 2 (a).

1508. The cesser of joint worship follows the cesser of commensality. In the unsophisticated orthodox families joint worship is yet an index of jointness, though such families are fast disappearing with the advance of western education, the result of which however is to loosen the tie of jointness both in commensality and in estate.

1509. In an orthodox household the family deity is worshipped by all members of a joint family. Even if they separate in mess and residence some arrangement is agreed upon for the joint worship of the household gods. But where this is not possible it must be regarded as yet another circumstance in favour of the disruption of jointness. (4)

1510. Such was the case of two brothers, by name Gannu and Lalji who first separated in mess owing to quarrels between their wives and then gradually drifted away from each other till they became separate in mess, residence and business. On his separation from his brother, Lalji acquired a house-site in exchange for his land and built thereon a house of his own, upon which the court said: "This separate acquisition of land for a house in lieu of a specific portion of the paternal land is an indication of an intention on the part of Lalji to separate himself and his family from his brother Gannu and the paternal house." (1) Lalji got his name separately recorded in the land records and began to make separate collections of his revenue, all of which facts strengthened the presumption in favour of separation which the court held proved by the conduct of the parties.

1511 But another material element in considering the evidentiary

time material.

value of such cesser is the relationship of the parties and the duration of their separation in mess and worship. As West, J., said: "It is a recognized principle that, when a Hindu family has once been proved to have been joint, it lies on those who assert a subsequent separation to prove it. The state of things shown to have existed is presumed to have continued, until the contrary be shown. But it is not inconsistent with this doctrine and is indeed, obvious that as the course of nature itself brings about inevitable changes in a family, the presumption is one which grows weaker at each stage of descent from the common ancestor. Brothers are for the most part united; second cousins are generally separated. After a considerable lapse of time, testimony of the precise terms on which a partition was effected and of the precise time at which it was made, will, in most cases be wanting. The presumption that the old state of things continued, is at some point met by the presumption that the present state of things had a legal origin, and it cannot be said that the Hindu Law, in the form in which it has come down to this generation, looks on all separation of families with disfavour. Many sages point complacently to the increase of offerings that attends the separate performance of family religious ceremonies and the pressure of modern circumstance tends steadily towards disruption. There may be a separation gradually effected by tacit agreement, as well as one by express contract. (2) Where, therefore, we find descendants in two lines in the fourth, fifth and sixth degree, from a common ancestor the presumption in favour of continued union between the two branches though it has not altogether vanished, has become but a slender one. If it is met by proof of long continued exclusive possession of parcels of the original family estate, of independent dealings with the parcels in its own possession by each branch, of a total separation in food and residence, it cannot in general prevail against the inference which such facts suggest. It would be unreasonable that it should." (3) In this case the plaintiff who was beyond the fourth degree was found to have lived separate for 50 years from the defendant who was within the fourth degree of the common ancestor. They had enjoyed no portion of the family property in common during this time. The court held these facts to rebut the presumption of jointness and dismissed the plaintiff's suit for partition. The same view was taken in another case in which it was found that the several branches of the family had been living separate for 40 or 50 years and either enjoying for that long period separate and distinct portions of the family property, or portions of the property in regular rotation, that they dealt with the separate portions in every respect as their own property and, lastly, that in the survey records the lands were entered in the names of the several branches in respect of their one-sixth shares. This evidence as to the mode of enjoyment by the several branches of the family during so long a period was held to establish a tacit agreement of enjoyment according to their shares, and bringing the case within the principle of Appovier's case. (1) So in another case it was laid down that the acts of different members of a family in allowing separate portions of the banks of a tank to be held severally for so long time that no one could tell when such possession began, constituted a separation of the lands which could not be disturbed at the instance of one member, without proof that he had jointly or otherwise held possession of the land in question within 12 years. (2)

1512. An agreement between co-parceners that their property was to be divided and that thenceforward they were to maintain separate accounts and not accountable for the profits and losses of each other is in itself a complete partition. (3)

1513. Separate enjoyment.—Long continued separation in mess and worship can seldom exist without separation in enjoyment of property or income. In order to show separation it may not be necessary to prove a formal partition for it may be that a formal partition was never made, and if made it cannot be proved. In such case the only means of proving partition is by proof of separate enjoyment for a sufficiently long time so as to rebut the presumption of jointness. So where the parties were found to have been in possession of separate lands, enjoying their produce or collecting their rents the court felt justified in presuming a separation. (4) Such presumption will gain in strength if the person in possession has no right to it, as for instance, she was a female who could only be suffered in possession if there was a separation (5) or where members realize their quota of rent from the same property. (6) In such and similar cases separate appropriation would be very good evidence of a tacit agreement amongst the members to hold their property according to their separate shares. (7) So where four co-parceners entered into an agreement to have their shares separately recorded in the Collector's registers and to divide the income of their banking business in equal shares which was done the court held it to amount to a clear partition and this view was on appeal affirmed by the Privy Council. (8) Where the parties exercised ownership over the property in certain defined shares of which the collections and management were separate the court held the joint tenancy severed though not immediately followed by a de facto actual division of the subject-matter. (9)

The presumption arising from separate enjoyment would be considerably strengthened if it is found that one of the parties in possession of his lot had considerably improved it or had alienated it to other members of the family or to a stranger. (10) to hold their property according to their separate shares.<sup>(1)</sup> So where members of a family were shown to collect their quota of rent separately, it was held to be good proof of separation<sup>(2)</sup> being the very reverse of a common chest which is the one index of a normal joint family.<sup>(3)</sup> Where it is found as a fact that the collections and management are separate, only two inferences are possible either that there had been a separation or that it was an arrangement for convenience of management. The latter would be presumed if the profits received by different members were unequal and there was a blending of the funds at times. But if the profits were in set order and received by members without mutual accountability it would be treated as a prima facie case of separation.<sup>(4)</sup>

1515. Agreement to divide.—It has already been stated before that an agreement to divide has the effect of partition. Such agreement may be express or implied. When it is express the question is one of construction. When implied, it is one for inference from the proved and admitted facts and circumstances of each case. The question whether a mere agreement to divide operates as partition was first settled in Appovier's case<sup>(5)</sup> in accordance with the current of existing decisions<sup>(6)</sup> and has been since followed in numerous cases.<sup>(7)</sup> The contrary laid down in some cases<sup>(8)</sup> can no longer be maintained.

1516. The definition of shares, if unexplained, would be evidence of partition<sup>(9)</sup> and it will be strong if it is followed up by entries of separate interests in the revenue records.<sup>(10)</sup>

Cl. 2 (e).

The rule was thus stated in Appovier's case :<sup>(11)</sup> "But when the members of the undivided family agree among themselves with regard to particular property that it shall thenceforth be the subject of ownership in certain defined shares, then the character of undivided property and joint enjoyment is taken away from the subject-matter so agreed to be dealt with and in the estate each member has thenceforth a definite and certain share which he may claim the right to receive and to enjoy in severalty, although the property itself has not become actually severed and divided." So where two brothers Gannu and Lalji who were originally joint, owing to disputes between their wives began to drift away from each other till finally they became separate in mess, worship and business. Lalji had built for himself a separate dwelling-house on a site acquired by him. He got his name separately entered in the land records and commenced to make separate realization of his income from which the court presumed separation. (1)

1517. Of course, all these facts may be explained away as consistent with continued jointness. As the Privy Council observed: "It was contended no behalf of the appellants in the present suit that, although the decree in the suit of 1868, may have effected a separation quod Tundan and Tukan, it left the plaintiffs united inter se: and that this might have been the legal effect of the decree is undeniable. But here again the conduct of the parties must be looked at, in order to arrive at what constitutes the true test of partition of property according to Hindu Law, namely the intention of the members of the family to become separate owners." (2) This may be illustrated by the converse case. One Baijnath died leaving four sons two by each of his two wives. His two sons by his junior wife were minors and she applied for a certificate for managing the property of her minor son. A son by the other wife opposed the application on the ground that the family was joint. On the death of the father the names of all the four sons had been registered with specification of their respective shares and it was contended that this coupled with the application for management amounted to partition. But the court found that the shares of the brothers had to be specified in compliance with the provisions of the Land Registration Act and that the application for management had been made under an erroneous impression that such application was maintainable even as regards a member of a joint family. There was then a division of rights without any intention to divide and the family was therefore held to be joint in spite of the definition of shares. (3)

1518. Independent dealings.—Independent dealings by a member with a stranger, and what is more, with another member of the family showing mutual credits and debits is a very strong index of separation. (4)

This may however be for the facility of accounting, as in the case of banking families with several shops who trade with one another on independent footing though at the close of the year their profits and losses are amalgamated with those of the head shop which prepares a consolidated balance sheet to indicate the progress of business. It is, however, against the rules of co-parcenership that the widow should succeed to her husband. Where it is so, and the other co-parceners have dealings with her as the heir of the husband, it raises a strong prima facie case of separation. (5) The mutual dealings between quondam co-parceners are of course far more conclusive than co-parceners' dealings with outsiders. But even in this case it is evidence which must vary in degree according to circumstances. Suppose for instance that a family banker opens independent accounts with different co-parceners who deal with them taking advances and making payments independently of each other, it would be evidence that each had a separate chest which would destroy one symbol of jointness. So again the longer such dealings continue the stronger would be the presumption against jointness. On the other hand, it may be that such dealings are merely resorted to for convenience and in the interest of the joint family. But this must be proved. It cannot be presumed.

* 1519. Stranger's seizure ineffectual—The last clause states a rule which is a necessary corollary of the main principle that intention is the sole test of partition. Where therefore, there is no intention to separate, an act of the stranger in seizing and selling the undivided interest of a co-parcener in execution of a decree against him has not the effect of legal partition. (1) The case would however, be different where the co-parcener voluntarily sells away his share in all the co-parcenary property in which case the joint tenancy in respect of the share alienated is put an end to and the alienee becomes a tenant in common with the remaining co-parceners. (2)

1520. Definement of shares.—The definement of shares is sufficient to constitute partition provided it is made with that intention. The settlement and other Revenue Officers sometimes allot shares of their own motion to the different members of the family with a view to maintain a record of all shares. If this is not a voluntary act at the instance of the coparceners it cannot constitute separation. But if the sharers get their separate shares recorded in the revenue papers then it would clearly be evidence from which separation might be inferred. (3) But the mere mention of shares in the record of rights or in the mutation register (4) is not sufficient. (5) But in a case where half-brothers claimed a deceased brother's share in certain villages and lands against his widow whose names as also those of his half-brothers had been separately recorded in the revenue records, and it was in evidence that the half-brothers had executed separate mortgages in respect of their respective shares, and they did not go into the witness box to explain how these transactions, though separate were consistent with jointness, the Privy Council held that their acts were only consistent with the hypothesis of separation. (6)

1521. Purchase in individual names.—It is quite common in joint families to make purchases in the name of individual members either for luck or in recognition of their co-parcenary rights, and at times, it is to be feared, from a desire to provide against the rainy day in case the family debts should outgrow its assets. In any case that circumstance alone raises no presumption of separation, though it is evidence which when taken with other facts may suffice to establish it. But of itself it is insufficient. (1)

1522. Conversion to an alien faith.—It has already been stated before that the conversion of a Hindu to another faith such as Brahmoism or Sikhism has not the effect of casting him outside the pale of Hinduism (§ 295). Nor does the conversion of a Hindu to an alien creed deprive him of any right which he possessed before his conversion. The question still remains whether by reason of such conversion he ceases to be a member of the co-parcenary. The question was considered by the Privy Council who said: "What is the position of a member of Hindu family who has become a convert to Christianity. . . . He becomes at once severed from the family, and regarded by them as an outcast. The tie which bound the family together is so far as he is concerned not only loosened but dissolved. The obligations consequent on and connected with the tie must, it seems to their Lordships, be dissolved with it. Parcenership may be put an end to by a severance effected by partition; it must, as their Lordships think, equally be put an end to by severance which the Hindu Law recognizes and creates. Their Lordships, therefore, are of opinion, that upon the conversion of a Hindu to Christianity, the Hindu Law ceases to have any continuing obligatory force upon the convert. He may renounce the old law by which he was bound, as he has renounced his old religion or, if he thinks fit, he may abide by the old law, notwithstanding he has renounced the old religion." (2)

1523. These observations were, however, made in a case in which all members of the family were converts to Christianity. In that case it is clear that all may renounce the religion but continue to preserve their joint status. (3)

The case would, however, be different, where while the family remains Hindu, only some of its members renounce Hinduism. In that case it is possible that by common consent of all the members the family may still continue joint, but in the absence of such consent, conversion will be presumed to effect a severance. (4)

effect a division of the joint undivided property, (1) though it is a circumstance which is prima facie evidence of separation. Even a formal division between some members would not operate as separation of the rest inter se unless they had intended to separate. By an award the property of a joint family consisting of an uncle and two nephews was partitioned, one share being allotted to the uncle and one to the nephews, but nothing was said as to the shares to be taken by the nephews individually nor did they express any desire to separate. It was held that the partition did not effect any separation between the nephews inter se. (2) A converse case was that in which there was a partition but the separated member availed himself of the services of his near agnatic relations in the administration of his property and at the same time he gave them maintenance and paid the expenses of their marriage and other ceremonies all of which facts were natural and probable but could not prove jointness in estate. (3) Where members have been in joint enjoyment of the estate for several generations the mere fact that the estate has never been partitioned is no proof of its impartibility nor can such a plea deprive a member of his vested right of partition. (4)

1525. Limitation.—Closely allied to the question of separation is that of exclusion. Though in a normal family the possession of one is the possession of all (5) this presumption cannot be availed of by one against whom exclusion is proved. As exclusion for twelve years suffices to quiet a claim otherwise good for partition, the question whether separation amounted to exclusion cannot be ignored, though what fact converts one into the other cannot be generally stated in the form of an abstract proposition. It may, however, be premised that there can be no exclusion without denial of co-parcenary right. Such denial may be express or implied as if the co-parcener should demand maintenance and it is refused; or that the co-parcener is expelled from the joint family. (6) Such a plea was taken in a suit for partition by the plaintiff whose claim was alleged to be barred by time on the ground that his father was alleged to have been expelled from the family for his misconduct. Both parties adduced voluminous evidence which the Privy Council rejected as equally untrustworthy. There remained the fact that for five years before the suit the plaintiff had reappeared in the village and was recognized as a member of the family, which was held to be sufficient to support his claim to partition. (7)

1526. Where the title is clear the court is loath to presume exclusion from a mere non-participation in profits of the joint property. The rule of the English common law that the entry and possession of one of several owners having a joint title enures for the benefit of all and is tantamount to a possession of them all (8) has been modified in England by statute (9) but since there is no similar statutory modification of the common law applicable to this country the

English common law rule still obtains here, (1) the result being that while in England possession is prima facie exclusive and adverse, possession here is never so treated if it can be traceable to any lawful title. Even as between tenants in common the possession of one is not necessarily adverse to the rest unless there is ouster. (2)

1527. This was settled by Privy Council in an appeal from Ceylon in which a co-parcener had set his possession as adverse to the rest upon which the Privy Council observed: "Entering into possession and having a lawful title to enter he could not divest himself of that title by pretending that he had no title at all. His title must have endured for the benefit of his co-proprietors. . . His possession was in law the possession of his co-owners. It was not possible for him to put an end to that possession by any secret intention in his mind. Nothing short of ouster or something equivalent to ouster could bring about that result." (3)

1528. Analogous Law.—Partition suits are subject to the modern statutory procedure which has abrogated the Hindu processual law on the subject.

The rule as to the joinder of parties in partition suits is thus stated: "It is a general principle of law that a litigation can never result in an adjudication which will be binding upon others than the parties to the suit, and their privies in blood or in estate. To this general rule proceedings in rem form no exception for in those proceedings the subject of the litigation is itself a party and being itself bound by the result, all interests in it must be likewise bound. A suit for partition is sometimes spoken of as a proceeding in rem; but ordinarily it is not such a proceeding, for the process is not served upon the land nor is the land a party defendant, nor is the final judgment binding on any of the co-tenants who were not brought within the jurisdiction of the court by some service of process, actual or constructive. It is, therefore indispensable that all the co-tenants, not uniting in the petition be made parties defendants." (1) So elsewhere it is said: "A decree for partition cannot be made, unless all persons interested in the premises are made parties to the suit; and the party applying for a partition of lands must not only have a present estate in the premises of which partition is sought, as a joint tenant or tenant in common, but he must also be actually or constructively in the possession of his undivided share or interest in such premises. Because if there is adverse possession, valid and succeeding, the only proper course for the court to pursue is to dismiss the bill as having been prematurely filed." (2) This necessity for impleading all persons entitled to a share is obvious, since in a suit for partition by a person, his share cannot be ascertained without hearing the other sharers. The quantum of the plaintiff's share can only be determined with reference to the number of sharers and their respective shares. (8)

1529. So the Privy Council observed: "If any co-sharer applied for a partition of a property, he must make the other co-sharers defendants, because the partition which is made in his favour is a partition against his co-sharers. That which gives him a portion of the property takes away all right which they would otherwise have to that portion and therefore it is a decree against them and in favour of himself." (4)

Only sharers and not all possible claimants should be arrayed in a partition suit. For instance, in a partition between the father and his sons, the sons who have separated from their father have no shares. (5) They need not then be joined. The persons entitled to claim partition are set out in S. 134. They are necessary parties. So are the persons entitled to a share, such as the wife, mother (6) or grandmother, the unmarried sister (7) enunciated in S. 136. They are equally necessary parties.

Purchasers of undivided shares should also be impleaded. (8)

But a mere maintenance grantee is not a necessary or proper party. (9)

The case of mortgagees and lessees will be presently considered.

1530. Necessary parties.—It is a general rule that all persons interested ought to be made parties to a suit, however numerous they may be, so that the court may be enabled to do complete justice by deciding upon and settling the rights of all persons interested and that the orders of the court may be safely executed by those who are compelled to obey them and future litigation may be prevented. (1) It is in obedience to this rule that in partition suits all known co-sharers must be before the court. (2) The term "known co-sharers" covers all who are known to have an interest in the property, and it is not limited to those whose names may have been recorded under any Act. (3) Where it cannot be ascertained with precision that any co-parcener is alive, then both the unascertained co-parcener and his legal representatives should be impleaded as defendants. (4) The owner of twelve annas share in a joint zamindari granted to the plaintiff a mukarari lease of his share in a small portion of land within the Zamindari. The owners of the remaining four annas share granted patni of his share in the whole zamindari to the defendant. The plaintiff brought a suit against the defendant for partition of the small plot of land. It was held that such a suit was not maintainable without the zamindars as parties, for if such a claim were allowed the defendants might in respect of the same estate be subjected to many claims for partition at the suit of persons in the plaintiff's position. (5) So where the plaintiffs sued for the partition of certain Jamas to a half share of which they were entitled as tenants under the owner of a share of the proprietary title. The title to possession of the remaining half share of the Jamas was in S, the owner of the remaining half share of the proprietary title. The proprietors as between themselves were undivided in respect of the Jamas. The suit had been brought against S alone. The first court decreed the suit, but the lower Appellate Court set aside the decree and remanded the suit for the purpose of giving the plaintiff an opportunity to bring M on the record. It was held that M was, if not a necessary party, at least a proper party to the suit as his presence was necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in it. (6)

1531. Unnecessary parties.—In a partition of tenancy rights the landlord is not a necessary party. (7) But a permanent lease holder is a necessary party to a partition suit between two grantees (8) the decision being made on the ground that any other course would lead to multifariousness. In a partition of proprietary rights the mortgagee of a share is not a necessary party since such mortgagee is on partition entitled to the share allotted to his co-sharer in lieu of that mortgaged to him. (9) In a suit for partition by putnidars against darputnidars under his co-putnidars the co-putnidars must be made parties; but a darputnidar is not a necessary party. (10)

1532. Mortgagees.—It has already been stated that a "mortgagee is not a necessary party to a partition suit, but he may, and frequently, does obtain leave to attend the proceedings as a quasi party." (11)

Suit for partition 142. (1) Except as otherwise provided in this behalf, a suit for partition must relate to all property partible at the time and subject to the jurisdiction of the court in which the suit is instituted.

(2) Where however, such property is situate within the jurisdiction of more than one court suits may be brought in the several courts possessing the requisite jurisdiction.

1534. Analogous Law.—"The ordinary rule is that if persons are entitled beneficially to shares in an estate they may have a partition." (4) S. 134 enumerates those persons who are all entitled to sue for partition. It is not necessary that they should all jointly claim partition. Every member is individually entitled to the partition of his share, which he may put in suit. But persons merely entitled to a share at partition are not entitled to sue for it. Nor are the minors who may, however, be allowed partition in certain cases already stated (§§ 1425, 1431).

1535. Partition must be exhaustive.—"Once is a partition made." (5)
GI (1). Consequently, the plaintiff is ordinarily bound to bring his suit for a general partition which should include all property then available for partition. The only exceptions to this rule are those enumerated in S. 138.

A member of an undivided family cannot sue his co-sharers for his share in a single item of joint property such as a house (6) or an undivided field. He must sue for a general partition. (7)

It follows that a co-parcener cannot sue another to account to him for the income of the joint property so long as the family continues joint. But if the family has become separate there is then of course no objection to a suit instituted by one for unauthorized receipts by the other. A formal partition is not necessary. (1)

1536. In such cases the plaintiff may, but is not bound, to institute several suits at the same time in order to bring all the family property into a single partition. But as will be presently seen all such properties must necessarily be taken into account in a satisfactory division of shares. (2) If, therefore, some of this property is situate beyond the jurisdiction of the court it may stay proceedings till the other property is satisfactorily disposed of, or in the case of the High Court, it may grant leave to include it in the same suit. (3)

1537. Procedure in partition suits.—The plaintiff entitled to partition cannot sue for a mere declaration of his title (4) or for accounts of any or all of the properties, (5) though he may sue for joint possession, (6) or restoration of his previous khas possession. (7)

The first thing that the court has to see is that the suit is properly laid. In an ordinary suit for division of rights or enjoyment, when there is no question of exclusion from joint possession the court fee of Rs. 10 should suffice. (8) The value for purpose of the court's jurisdiction is the value of the plaintiff's share in the estate. (9)

1538. It is the duty of the plaintiff to sue and of the court to see that he has sued for a complete partition. If he has omitted to sue for it, it is his duty to explain. All co-parceners must be impleaded in the suit whether they admit or object to partition. The plaintiff's right to partition depends upon his title and not upon the defendant's refusal to give him his share. He need not therefore state more than that he has a share and that he wishes for its separation. (10) But if the plaintiff is a minor, then he must show cause why his share should be partitioned; for he cannot obtain a partition as a matter of course (§ 1425).

If the defendants admit his claim, and there is nothing to go before the Commissioner or the Collector, the court may at once pass a final decree. It is not bound to decree the claim in two stages in every case.

If the defendants contest the suit, it must be tried like any other suit. If the defence is that the plaintiff is suing for partition, while he is keeping back the property in his possession which must have been put into the hotchpot the court may compel him to do so, or throw out his claim. (11) If the defendants wish their own shares to be ascertained and partitioned off they will be permitted to do so on payment of the requisite court fee. (1) In such case the parties are in the position of cross claimants and each will have to prove his case and will be allotted his share. (2) Where the plaintiff's title is denied, the first thing he must do is to prove it. If he is found to have no share at all, there is no suit for partition and consequently no necessity to determine the defendant's share. (3) But it is open to the plaintiff to claim partition or in the alternative, possession of the property bequeathed to him in his father's will. If the partition fails because he has failed to bring the property in his possession into hotchpot it is no reason for not investigating his alternative claim. (4) Where the plaintiff denies the existence of other properties the court should direct an enquiry into the existence (5) and if the plaintiff expresses his willingness to bring it into hotchpot, his suit should not be dismissed. (6) A suit for partition may be dismissed because the plaintiff was governed by the Aliyasatan Law which does not admit of the right to partition (7) though it admits of a family arrangement for the separate enjoyment of property. (8) Prima facie however all joint property is subject to partition and the onus of proof is on the party seeking to except any property from the general rule. (9)

1539. Even though the land is in the possession of tenants entitled to be possession under subsisting leases, that would not be a bar to a partition of the property among the members of the family. (10) Where a co-parcener's interest in co-parcenary property is sold at the instance of his creditor, the balance of the sale proceeds does not cease to be co-parcenary property and is therefore partible. (11)

The dismissal of a suit for partial partition does not bar another suit for a general partition of the property. (12)

A partition is limited to the interest of the person demanding it and has no enforced general operation against those who desire to live in union. (13)

143. (1) Every person entitled to a share may demand the partition of his share in specie and such partition may be made except in the circumstances next following:—

- (2) Where the thing is by its nature indivisible.
- (3) Or where its partition in specie will destroy its intrinsic value or be otherwise inconvenient.
- (4) Where its sale is demanded and justified by the Partition Act.

1540. Analogous Law.—Prima facie all property is partible in specie and must be so partitioned. "It is an elementary principle that in case of partition where several persons are co-owners or co-sharers of immoveable property, partition should be effected between them by giving to each his share in specie as far as practicable." (1) The right of each sharer is to his slice of the property, not merely its money value, and it is a matter of common experience that great importance is attached in this country to the possession of a share in specie by a co-sharer of property which has belonged to the family of which he is a member, or which has descended from an ancestor. The law gives effect to this sentiment as far as possible." (2) This rule is however subject to several exceptions, which may be stated: (1) If a property can be partitioned without destroying the intrinsic value of the whole property or of the shares, such partition ought to be made; if on the contrary no partition can be made without destroying the intrinsic value, then a money compensation should be given instead of the share which would fall to a party by partition. (3) (2) If one of the co-parceners wishes to keep the property entire, an opportunity should be afforded to him to do so, if he can agree on the subject with his co-parceners. (4) If they cannot agree it may be sold under the Partition Act.

1541. From S. 4 of the Partition Act the court will enforce the principle of equity in all partition cases, that when it is convenient to divide a property, it must be left in possession of the person in occupation, and the other person who cannot conveniently get actual possession compensated. So where the defendants in a suit for partition were found to have built a dwelling house on a plot of 7 cottahs of land without opposition from the plaintiff who was a stranger and owned only a one-tenth share in it and in an adjoining plot of 1 bigha 6 cottahs, the court disallowed the partition of the plots by metes and bounds but gave the defendant option to buy up the plaintiff's shares at a proper valuation. (5) But convenience must raise a special equity against partition in specie. (6)

1542. Partition of religious office.—The sacred texts treat hereditary offices, whether religious or secular as naturally indivisible, but modern custom has sanctioned their partition such as can be had of such property, by means of performance of the duties of the office and the enjoyment of the emoluments by the different co-parceners in rotation. (7)

1543. Religious office.—A religious office such that of a family priest is both inalienable and indivisible both because it includes a right of personal service as also on the ground of public policy. But a distribution of duties by rotation is nevertheless recognized as permissible as also the relinquishment of duties by one member in favour of other members of the same family and if so permitted by custom, even in favour of other persons of the priestly caste. (1) Such are also the Muths which are associations of Sanyasis or celebraies devoted to Divine worship who impart updes or religious instructions to deserving candidates. The house in which they live are also called Muths. They are in the nature of colleges for the performance of religious exercise and instruction and are by their very nature impartible and inalienable. (2) The pattam or office of dignity in a family governed by the Aliyasantana Law is indivisible and whether the family be divided or not, when no special arrangement has been made about it, the pattam descends to the eldest male of the surviving members of the family. (3) Priestly offerings are indivisible though members of a family may agree among themselves to throw their individual earnings into the common chest in which case the family earnings become their joint property and are as such partible. (4) Where a joint family consisting of three members asked for partition of their properties consisting amongst others, of family books in which the names of pilgrims were recorded it was held that the first step was actually to divide the books into three portions. In making this division the guiding principle should be to ascertain the number of entries in each book, and it may be possible to give to each party a number of leaves containing as nearly as possible the same number of entries as to any other co-parcener. The second step to be taken was to have certified copies prepared by the entries of these books and to give them to each of the parties. The result would be that each party would have one-third of the entries in original and two-thirds in certified copies. (5)

1544. Service inam.—Inam villages granted by Government to the grantee and his male heirs for services rendered to the State, are not by the Hindu Law in force in the Southern Mahratta country, distinguishable from other ancestral real estates and are divisible among the heirs of the grantee. (6) The enfranchisement of village service inams does not alter its incidents since the enfranchisement has merely the effect of a separating the land from the office and imposing thereon a quit rent instead of the full assessment. The effect of enfranchisement and the issue of a title is to exonerate the inam from the conditions of service and convert it into ordinary property subject to the payment of quit rent and not to resume the same from the family or person entitled to the hereditary office and to make a fresh grant of the same. (7)

1545. Costs.—As the plaintiff in a partition suit commences it for his own advantage, convenience and security and as the defendant, as joint owner holds his undivided share always subject to the right of the plaintiff to demand partition, the parties' costs suit up to the stage of the preliminary decree, and the costs of the partition should be divided between the parties in proportion to their respective shares in the estate. (8) If, however, there has been a frivolous contest the party by reason of whose opposition unnecessary costs are incurred may be made liable. (9)

1546. Partition Act.—In making a partition the court may resort to the provisions of the Partition Act which empower it to order a sale instead of partition by metes and bounds. The provisions of this Act run as follows:—

THE PARTITION ACT, 1893.

(ACT IV OF 1893.)

(PASSED ON THE 9TH MARCH 1893.)

An Act to amend the law relating to partition. Whereas it is expedient to amend the law relating to partition, it is hereby enacted as follows :

Title, extent, commencement and saving.

1. (1) This Act may be called the Partition Act, 1893 ;

(2) It extends to the whole of British India ; and

(3) It shall come into force at once.

(4) But nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect any local law providing for the partition of immoveable property paying revenue to Government.

[Notes.—This act amends so much of Hindu Law as is inconsistent with its provisions. The act applies to all partitions except only those which are by the several enactments placed within the special jurisdiction of Revenue officers.]

2. Whenever in any suit for partition in which, if instituted prior to the commencement of this Act, a decree for partition might have been made, it appears to the court that by reason of the nature of the share-holders therein or of any other special circumstance, a division of the property, and distribution of the proceeds would be more beneficial for all the share-holders, the court may, if it thinks fit, on the request of any such share-holders interested individually or collectively to the extent of one moiety or upwards, direct a sale of the property and a distribution of the proceeds.

[Notes.—The “decree” in the section includes a preliminary decree. (1) This section may be resorted to even after the preliminary decree for partition. (2) Under this section a co-parcener who applies for sale has no right to buy up the share or shares of the remaining co-sharers who have not applied under S. 2 to have his share converted into money. (3)

Mortgagee rights in a revenue paying estate may be sold under this Act. They are not excluded by anything contained in the U. P. Land Revenue Act, 1901. (4)

To vest the court with power to sell under this section, there must be a request by a party or parties interested in the property to the extent of one moiety or upwards. Otherwise, the sale if any, made is a nullity. (5)

A lessee for a term of years may, it is said, maintain a partition suit and apply for sale under this Act. (1)

3. (1) If, in any case in which the court is requested under the foregoing section to direct a sale, any other share-holder applies for leave to buy at a valuation the share or shares of the party or parties asking for a sale, the court shall order a valuation of the share or shares in such manner as it may think fit and offer to sell the same to such share-holder at the price so ascertained, and may give all necessary and proper directions in that behalf.

(2) If two or more share-holders severally apply for leave to buy as provided in sub-section (1) the court shall order a sale of the share or shares to the share-holder who offers to pay the highest price above the valuation made by the court.

(3) If no such share-holder be willing to buy such share or shares at the price so ascertained, the applicant or applicants shall be liable to pay all costs of or incidental to the application or applications.

[Notes :—The party applying for sale cannot obtain leave to purchase the share of the other party entitled to partition. Under the section the court cannot sell the whole of the property in question at a valuation but only the share or shares of the applicant or applicants for sale. (2);

4. (1) Where a share of a dwelling house belonging to an undivided family has been transferred to a person who is not a member of such family and such transferee sues for partition, the court shall, if any member of the family being a share-holder shall undertake to buy the share of such transferee, make a valuation of such share in such manner as it thinks fit and direct the sale of such share to such share-holder and may give all necessary and proper directions in that behalf.

(2) If in any case described in sub-section (1) two or more members of the family being such share-holders severally undertake to buy such share the court shall follow the procedure prescribed by sub-section (2) of the last foregoing section.

[Notes.—This section may be regarded as a corollary to S. 44 of the Transfer of Property Act.]

The object of this section is to provide an alternative course by which a plaintiff claiming partition by metes and bounds may be compelled at the option of the defendant whether he himself likes it or not, to forego his legal right to such partition and to accept pecuniary compensation in respect thereof. Enacted as the section is for the benefit of defendants, and involving as it does a statutory interference with the plaintiff's legal rights it should be strictly construed. The words "shall undertake" mean something more than a mere offer to purchase, conveying as it does the sense of an unconditional offer from which the person making it will not be permitted to resile. On such understanding being given, the court is bound to execute a deed of sale. (1)

The "undivided family" quit the dwelling house is sufficient. (2) This must be decided before the preliminary decree. (3) An application under S. 2 or this section may be made after the preliminary decree. (4) The term "family" as used here should be liberally construed as including a group of persons related by blood who live in one house or under one head or management. It should not be understood in its narrower sense as denoting a body of persons who can trace their descent from a common ancestor. (5) It is the ownership and not occupation that gives the right. (6)

The valuation is to be made according to the highest bid among co-sharers. (7) It is open to the court, which has fixed a time within which the price of a share of the property which is to be partitioned is to be paid, to afterwards extend the time. (8) Where the nature of the property to be divided is such that a division thereof, amongst all the share-holders, cannot reasonably or conveniently be made, the proper course to follow is to direct a sale of the property among the co-sharers; and it should be given to that share-holder who offers to pay the highest price above the valuation made by the court. The defendant cannot be compelled to transfer his share at a valuation to the plaintiff merely because the latter happens to have possession of the property at the time when he commenced the action. (9)

5. In any suit for partition a request for sale may be made or an undertaking, or application for leave to buy may be given or made on behalf of any party under disability by any person authorized to act on behalf of such party in such suit, but the court shall not be bound to comply with any such undertaking or application unless it is of opinion that the sale or purchase will be for the benefit of the party under such disability.

6. (1) Every sale under S. 2 shall be subject to a reserved bidding and the amount of such bidding shall be fixed by the court in such manner as it may think fit and may be varied from time to time.

(2) On any such sale, any of the share-holders shall be at liberty to bid at the sale on such terms as to non-payment of deposit or as to setting off or accounting for the purchase money or any part thereof instead of paying the same into court, as to the court may seem reasonable.

Procedure to be followed in case of sales. 7. Save as herein before provided, when any property is directed to be sold under this Act, the following procedure shall as far as practicable be adopted namely:

(a) If the property be sold under a decree or order of the High Court of Calcutta, Madras or Bombay in the exercise of its original jurisdiction or of the Court of the Recorder of Rangoon, the procedure of such court in its original Civil jurisdiction for the sale of property by the Registrar.

(b) If the property be sold under a decree or order of any other court, such procedure as the High Court may from time to time by rules prescribe in this behalf, and until such rules are made, the procedure prescribed in the Code of Civil Procedure in respect of sales in execution of decrees.

8. Any order for sale made by the court under Ss. 2, 3 or 4 shall be deemed to be a decree within the meaning of S. 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

9. In any suit for partition the court may, if it shall think fit, make a decree for a partition of part of the property to which the suit relates and a sale of the remainder under this Act.

10. This Act shall apply to suits instituted before the commencement thereof, in which no scheme for the partition of the property has been finally approved by the court.

Mutual non-liability to account.

143. (1) Partition must be made only of such property as is available at the date of demand.

(2) In the absence of fraud or misappropriation the manager is not liable to account to the co-parceners for past transactions or to pay them mesne profits in respect of property in his possession.

(3) Provided that if partition is demanded and refused or a co-parcener is excluded from joint or separate possession to which he was entitled under an arrangement, he may be allowed mesne profits from the date of such refusal or exclusion.

(4) Nor are the other members entitled to the cost of improvement or are accountable for the profits made from property in their separate possession.

1547. Analogous Law.—It is a general rule that a partition must be made rebus sic stantibus as on the date of demand or suit for partition, and that no claimant can demand an account of back profits of the properties purchased and sold by the manager prior to the date of claim <sup>(1)</sup> it being assumed that all past transactions were consented to or acquiesced in by the other co-parceners. As observed in a case.—“The broad and general rule is that while there is a manager of a Hindu family, he and he alone is responsible, and that those who seek partition must take the estate as they find it when partition is asked for. That general rule has its exceptions engrafted upon it in favour of the minor, for it is said that the rule rests upon the acquiescence or presumed acquiescence of all adult members of the family in the management, and no such acquiescence can be presumed in the case of minors.” <sup>(2)</sup> But this does not imply that a minor is entitled to call for account. The only occasion for accounts arises when the manager is shewn to have been guilty of fraud or misappropriation. Otherwise there is no liability to account for past transactions; though the court is justified in decreeing mesne profits as from the date of the suit too. <sup>(3)</sup> But this does not mean that there should be no accounts at all; or that the co-parceners are bound to accept the ipse dixit of the manager. The co-parceners are entitled to challenge the manager's statement as to the existence of assets, but the inquiry must be confined to the existing assets <sup>(4)</sup> in the hands of the manager and of the other members. The parties have no right to look back and claim relief against past inequality and enjoyment of the members or other matters.

1548. Mesne profits.—Since the possession of one is the possession of all, no co-parcener can claim mesne profits from the manager for a period preceding the date of partition. The only exceptions allowed are when a co-parcener was disturbed in his possession of any specific share or property to which he was entitled under a family arrangement when he becomes entitled both to profits and partition. <sup>(5)</sup> Mesne profits would be allowed as a matter of course where the members hold their property in quasi-severalty. Such are co-parceners in Bengal <sup>(6)</sup> but even under the Mitakshara the position of the manager might be reduced to that of an agent in which case he would clearly be accountable to the other members. But such a case is only conceivable in a quasi-co-parcenary which is a creature of contract and not one of law. <sup>(7)</sup> Even in a normal family accounts might be ordered where one member of the family has been entirely excluded from the enjoyment of the property. (1) So again it is a case for account where a member has demanded his share and it has been improperly refused, since such demand is sufficient to constitute partition, the members refusing, being taken to hold adversely to the claimant from the date of refusal. Since the institution of a suit for partition is such a demand, the plaintiff would be entitled to an account of mesne profits from that date (2) or from the date of refusal or exclusion, if not earlier. 1549. Accounts of private dealings.—Where one co-parcener had agreed to pay his debt due to another co-parcener by setting it off against his share it is a claim which may be adjusted in a suit for partition. (4)

(a) All family debts.

(d) Such religious and other ceremonies for which the joint property is liable.

1550. Analogous Law.—At the threshold of partition stand certain family charges which must be first met before the co-parcenership is broken up by partition. Of these the family debts, that is to say such debts as are legally and properly payable out of the joint funds must be first met. (6)

1551. Shortly stated these are debts incurred by the manager for family necessity or benefit, and those incurred by the father and such as are not illegal or immoral. In a composite family consisting of sons and collaterals, it is manifest that while some debts might be binding on the joint family as a whole, there might be others which would be only on the sons. These would have to be apportioned in accordance with the liability of members

To the same effect are the placita in Yajnavalkya, (3) the Mitakshara (4) and the Dayabhag. (5)

The text bearing on the subject of the sister's marriage expenses runs as follows:—

Mitakshara :—5. In regard to unmarried sisters, the author states a different rule. "But sisters should be disposed of in marriage giving them as an allotment, the fourth part of a brother's own share". (6)

6. The purport of the passage is this: Sisters also, who are not already married, must be disposed of in marriage, by the brethren contributing a fourth part out of their own allotments. (7)

1553. In a partition provision must be made for the expenses of the Upnayan and marriage of male co-parceners as well as for the expenses of the marriage of the unmarried sisters out of the family property whether it is ancestral or separate, or self-acquired property of the father of the parties. A brother who has had his own marriage performed at the family expense is not entitled to object to a similar provision being made for the other brothers. (8)

The quantum of cost must depend upon the wealth and social position of the family. While the Upnayan and marriage of every co-parcener is a necessary religious rite and as such a charge on the family estate, the same cannot be predicated of every female member of the family. For instance while in a family comprising collaterals the marriage of sisters is a necessary charge on the joint estate, that of the co-parcener's daughter is a charge upon his own individual share and can be deducted out of the joint fund. (9)

1554. Ceremonial expenses.—The religious or other ceremonial expenses chargeable to the joint property must be arranged for before partition of the corpus. Such are the expenses for the performance of the funeral and obsequial rites of the father (10) and the mother (11), the initiation ceremony of the brothers (12) though not of their sons (13) and indeed any charities in accordance with the practice of the family. Where the father makes a partition among his sons he possesses the right to make such provision for charities as he may in his discretion consider necessary to a reasonable extent. (14)

145. In a partition by metes and bounds the allotment of shares should be made as far as possible in conformity with the following rules :—

Equities on distribution of shares. (1) The separate possession of co-parceners of any property or which they have improved at their own expense should not be disturbed.

(2) The predilection of co-parceners to any property should be respected.

(3) Shares should be made as compact and convenient as the nature of the property would allow.

(4) The bona fide transferee of a defined portion of co-parcenary property should be protected in his right as far as possible.

1555. Analogous Law.—The rules here set out are condensed from the several Partition Acts relating to revenue paying estates and the cases in which they have been recognized. They are all rules conformable to natural equity which supplements all law, sacred and secular.

1556. Maintenance of the status quo.—It is a cardinal rule of all partitions that it should follow the line of least resistance, maintaining the status quo ante as far as possible and only deviating therefrom wherever it is necessary to equalize the shares. Where, therefore, a co-parcener has been in separate possession of any portion of the joint property and has improved it at his own cost it is both just and natural that he should claim to retain the status quo so far as the property in his possession is concerned. (1) This is in accordance with Hindu law under which if one build a house on ancestral land with separate funds of his own, the other members of the family have only a claim on him for other similar land equal to their respective shares. (2) Where a co-parcener had been in previous possession of a certain piece of land it should be allotted to him as a whole if possible. But it should not be sub-divided. (3) It is a well known principle of equity which must be adopted in all partition cases, that, when it is inconvenient to divide a property it must be left in the possession of the person in occupation, and the other persons who cannot conveniently get actual possession compensated. (1)

1557. Compensation for improvements—Where for any cause a co-parcener is not able to secure possession of the property which he had improved at his own cost, he would be allowed compensation for improvements, according to the general principle thus enunciated: "Where one tenant in common lays out money in improvements on the estate, although the money so paid does not in strictness, constitute a lien on the estate, yet a court of equity will not grant a partition without first directing an account and a suitable compensation. To entitle the tenant in common to an allowance on a partition, in equity, for the improvements made on the premises, it does not appear to be necessary for him to show the assent of his co-tenants to such improvements, or a promise on their part; nor is it necessary for him to show a previous request to join in the improvements and their refusal."

1558. Choice of property.—It is equally just that each co-parcener should be given the choice to choose his own share. But this again is an equity and not his right. (3) Consequently, where parties cannot agree amongst themselves as to any item of property, the court may order the sale instead of division of the property in accordance with the provisions of the Partition Act. (4)

1559. "A tenant-in-common in possession will be allowed for substantial and useful improvements but not for such improvements as are merely ornamental. The reason why a tenant in common will be allowed for improvements that are necessary and substantial improvements is because the possession of one tenant-in-common is the possession of that of his co-tenants. The court can properly render a judgment declaring that partition should be made; and also providing for an account between the parties in respect to the matters pertaining to the estate and in respect to the rents and profits already received. If there is inequality of value between one portion that cannot be divided, and another portion that can be, the commissioner may make such allotment of parcels as will produce equality by awarding proper compensation in money." (5) It has been held in the Punjab that a sharer cannot be allotted a greater share on account of his improvements. (6) But if he is entitled to compensation, a larger share may be only a measure of it.

1560. Compact and convenient shares.—It goes without saying that the very object of partition is to ensure the better enjoyment of the property which requires that the property should be divided into compact and convenient shares. As Story says: "A court of equity will assign to the parties respectively such parts of the estate as would best accommodate them, and be of most value to them with reference to their respective situations, in relation to the property before the partition. For, in all cases of partition, a court of equity does not act merely in a ministerial character and in obedience to the call of parties, who have a right to the partition; but it founds itself upon its general jurisdiction as a court of equity, and administers its relief ex equo et bono according to its own notions of general justice and equity between the parties. It will therefore, by its decree adjust all the equitable rights of the parties interested in the estate; and will if necessary for the purpose, give special instructions to the commissioners, and nominate the commissioners instead of allowing them to be nominated by the parties." (1) Partition must study the general convenience of all co-sharers and the special convenience of the sharer who has a special equity to any property. Where therefore, on half the land the defendant had constructed a costly building from the joint funds of the family, the court directed that the land be treated as joint family land, but that the price of one-third of half the land was made payable to the other co-sharers. (2) Here there was some equity apart from individual convenience which is no sufficient answer to a claim for partition of land by metes and bounds. (3) Where at the time of the partition of a dwelling house the brothers were found to have entered into an arrangement under which each was allowed an equal use of a single latrine in the house, the arrangement was held to amount to a partition which could not be interfered with except by re-opening the entire partition. It was further held that the Partition Act did not apply to such a case. (4)

1561. But of course such improvements should have been made in good faith. But "the only good faith required in such improvement is that they should be made honestly for the purpose of improving the property and not for embarrassing his co-tenants or encumbering their estate, or hindering partition."

But "if one joint tenant, or tenant-in-common, covers the whole of the estate with valuable improvements, so that it is impossible for his co-tenant to obtain his share of the estate without including a part of the improvement so made, the tenant making the improvements would not be entitled to compensation therefor, notwithstanding they may have added greatly to the value of the land; because it would be the improver's own folly to extend his own improvements over the whole estate, and because it would be unjust to permit a co-tenant at his pleasure to charge another co-tenant with improvements he may not have desired. In such a case, the improver stands as a mere volunteer and cannot without the consent of his co-tenant, lay the foundation for charging him with improvements."

1562. Transferee protected.—When a co-parcener has affected to transfer any specific item of co-parcenary property it is but equitable to the bona fide transferee that he should not suffer by any distribution of shares. Consequently it has been held that where a stranger has acquired any interest in co-parcenary property it is but equitable that in the distribution of shares such property should as far as possible be

1584. Analogous Law.—The law of re-union is founded on the text of Brihaspati <sup>(2)</sup> explained in the following texts :—

Texts.

Manu :—210. If brothers once divided and living again together as parceners, make a second partition, the shares must in that case be equal : and the first born shall have no right of deduction.

211. Should the eldest or youngest of several brothers be deprived of his share by a civil death on his entrance into the fourth order, or should any one of them die, his vested interest in a share shall not wholly be lost

212 But, if he have neither son, nor wife, nor daughter, nor father, nor mother, his uterine brothers and sisters, and such brothers as were re-united after a separation, shall assemble and divide his share equally <sup>(3)</sup>

Yajnavalkya :—Effects which had been divided and which are again mixed together are termed re united, and he to whom such appertain is a re-united parcener <sup>(4)</sup>

Mitakshara :—2. Effects which had been divided and which are again mixed together are termed re-united. He to whom such appertain is a re united parcener.

3. That cannot take place with any person indifferently but with a father, a brother or a paternal uncle, as Brihaspati declares :—

“He who being once separated dwells again through affection with his father, brother or paternal uncle is termed re-united.” <sup>(5)</sup>

Yivad Chintamani :—The first principle of re union is common consent of both the parties, and it may be either with the co heirs or with a stranger after the partition of wealth <sup>(6)</sup>

Mayukh :—(After citing the Mitakshara and Brihaspati.) Union may take place even with a wife, a paternal grandfather, a brother's grandson, and the rest, according to the rule that the subject and the predicate should inhere in the same object observable in the text : “He who having been separated again dwells together is re united” <sup>(7)</sup> <sup>(8)</sup>

Dayabhag :—(After quoting Brihaspati.) A special association among persons other than the relations here enumerated, is not to be acknowledged as a re union of parceners. for the enumeration would be unmeaning. <sup>(9)</sup>

Dayakram Sangrah :—3. Therefore, where a person has once become disunited from his father and the rest, afterwards, the former partition is annulled by mutual consent of the separated parties, and in consequence of an agreement being concluded to the following effect, 'the wealth which is thine is mine—that which is mine is thine', they resolve on dwelling in the same abode. This is considered re-union.

4. Here since the father and the others are particularly specified re-union takes place with those who are alone described, and not with nephews and the rest, who are not named. Otherwise the specific mention of father and the others would be unmeaning. Such is the opinion according to the Dayabhag.

5. The followers of the Mithila school are of opinion that the use of the term father and the rest is illustrative and that re-union takes place when those whose right to a share of the common property is established by their birth re-associate after having once separated. Consequently that re-union can occur with nephews and the rest. (1)

1585. It will be thus seen that both under the Mitakshara and the Dayabhag or the Bengal school of law, re-union is only possible with the father, brother or uncle. (2) It is not possible even between first cousins. (3) But there may be re-union between brothers whether of the whole blood or of the half blood. The only exception is the Mithila school which allows re-union between any co-parceners.

1586. Who may re-unite.—As regards the Mayukh, since it yields to the Mitakshara it cannot sanction a departure at variance with the latter. The texts before cited contemplate a limited and an unlimited re-union. In the first case re-union is only possible with the father, brother or paternal uncle, in the latter case all co-parceners who divided could re-unite. The latter view has been abandoned everywhere outside the Mithila country where such unlimited re-union is still conceivable.

1587. Even as regards the former there can be no re-union, unless there had been a previous union and separation. (4) If therefore the father and son were separate from the rest of the family re-union is possible with them and the family. (5) It is not necessary that the separation should be by a formal partition nor need the re-union be in a formal manner. What is however necessary is, that there must be an intention to re-unite. (6) Re-union cannot be presumed from the fact that the relations had postponed an apportionment of lands in severalty from motives of convenience. In order to constitute re-union four things are essential: (1)—a previous state of union; (2)—re-union, by those who have made a partition; (3)—an intention to re-unite; and (4)—the requisite relationship. Where, therefore, the sons take under their father's bequest, the sons cannot re-unite because the first two conditions in their case are wanting. (7) Again, since re-union must be made, by the very persons who made the partition, it follows that their descendants cannot re-unite. (8) They may of course re-unite in fact, but their re-union will not be a re-union in law reconstituting a co-parcenary with a right of survivorship.

1588. The question whether there has been a re-union is thus a question of fact, (9) but a fact which depends upon the proof of the intention to constitute re-union. The mere fact that two relations continue to live jointly after a partition is merely evidence which may establish re-union, but it has not necessarily that result. (10) For instance, where after partition in distinct shares amongst brothers, some of whom were minors, the minor brothers continued to live jointly with one of the adult brothers, that fact would not constitute a re-union since the minors were incapable of exercising any volition in favour of a re-union. (1) Even if the minors had been adults the mere fact of commensality would not prove re-union. For instance, where after a partition three brothers agreed that their separate shares should be kept joint and that the eldest should manage the same, the true effect of the agreement was held not to leave the family as a joint family but to render the eldest brother accountable for receipts and expenditure on the footing of ordinary agency and not of joint family management. (2) What was wanting in this case, it may be asked, to constitute a re-union? Only this, that the brothers did not amalgamate their shares, but merely kept them joint. In other words they agreed to be partners but not co-parceners. In order to constitute a re-union after partition, there should be a junction of estate and a re-union of property. "The property which is mine is thine, and that which is thine is mine." 3)

1589. While the minority of a co-parcener is no obstacle to a valid partition, it is an obstacle to a subsequent re-union, since in order to constitute a re-union there must be an agreement which the minor cannot enter into nor can any one on his behalf. As the Privy Council remarked of a re-union pleaded with a minor—"It is difficult also to see how an agreement for that purpose could have been made by or on behalf of the appellant during his minority." (4) Re-union is brought about through "affection" and it is not to the minor's benefit that his share should be placed in jeopardy in an affectionate compact.

152. (1) Subject to the following modifications, a re-unioned family is, for the purpose of succession, treated as a joint family.

Succession amongst re-unioned relations.

(2) In a re-union between brothers of the whole blood and those of half-blood the former succeed to each other in preference to the latter.

(3) Where brothers of the whole blood remain separate and only those of the half-blood re-unite, brothers of the whole blood and those of the half-blood and their descendants inherit together.

(4) Where only some brothers of the half-blood re-unite, those not re-united do not inherit.

Manu:—If re-united co-parceners make a fresh partition, the shares must be equal. The right of the law of primogeniture does not then apply. <sup>(1)</sup>

Yajñavalkya :—188. A re-united brother shall keep the share of his re-united co-heir who is deceased, or shall deliver it to a son subsequently born. But an uterine or whole brother shall thus retain or deliver the allotment of his uterine relation

139. A half brother being again associated may take the succession, not a half-brother though not re-united; but one united by blood though not by co-parcenary may obtain the property and not exclusively to the son of a different mother. <sup>(2)</sup>

Mitākshara :—6 The allotment of a re-united brother of the whole blood, who is deceased, shall be delivered by the surviving re-united brothers of the whole blood to a son born subsequently. But on the failure of such issue he shall retain it. Thus if there be brothers of the whole blood, an uterine or whole brother being a re-united parcener, not a half-brother who is so, takes the estate of the re-united uterine brother. This is an exception to what has been said before <sup>(3)</sup>

Dayabhag :—39. If there be competition between claimants of equal degree whether brothers of the whole blood or brothers of the half-blood, or sons of such brothers, or uncles, or the like, the re-united parcener shall take the heritage, for the text does not specify the particular relation and all these relations were premised in the preceding text and a question arises regarding all of them : therefore the text must be considered as not relating expressly to brothers. <sup>(4)</sup>

1591. Succession in re-united families.—Re-united members and their issue are co-parceners in a re-united family, <sup>(5)</sup> and however remote, succeed to the property of one another by survivorship. <sup>(6)</sup> This mode of succession is not confined to the members who actually re-united, since the son of a re-united member born after the re-union becomes re-united and takes by survivorship. <sup>(7)</sup>

In other words, on a re-union taking place, not only the parties re-uniting but their descendants and representatives however remote, will remain joint and succeed to one another on that footing of jointness until a fresh partition takes place, exactly in the same manner as in the ordinary case of a joint family the members remain joint until partition. <sup>(8)</sup> And this would be not standing that the portions brought in as re-union were unequal. <sup>(9)</sup> And in a competition for the succession to the estate of a deceased relative among those who stand in an equal degree of relationship to him, those descended from a re-united parcener are to be preferred to those who are descended from an unassociated parcener. <sup>(10)</sup> In such cases re-union is a ground for preference. <sup>(11)</sup>

1592. But in a competition between uterine and non-uterine brothers another idea influences the decision, namely, the superior efficacy of the funeral obligations offered by the uterine brother. That furnishes a ground of preference in his favour. If the re-united parcener is a brother of the whole blood both cases of succession concur. They conflict where there is a competition between a re-united brother of the half-blood and a separated brother of the whole blood. The rule of equal division is the outcome of the desire to give effect to both principles.

In a case the adopted son of a re-united half-brother was held to succeed equally with two unassociated full brothers. <sup>(1)</sup>

Burden of proving re-union. 153. He who relies upon re-union must prove it.

1593. Analogous Law.—It has already been stated that re-unions are nowadays rare, though not obsolete, <sup>(2)</sup> since the causes which lead to partition are not easy to eliminate nor is the state of independence born of partition easily forsaken. As the crux of partition is the intention so is that of re-union. <sup>(3)</sup> After a partition once completed the presumption in favour of jointness vanishes. <sup>(4)</sup> Consequently he who relies upon a re-union must prove it like any other fact. <sup>(5)</sup> It is said that after partition there is a presumption against a re-union. <sup>(6)</sup> At any rate, there is no presumption that when some separate the rest remain united and in the absence of a presumption either way, the fact of reunion must be clearly proved. <sup>(7)</sup>

CHAPTER XII.

IMPARTIBLE ESTATES.

1594. Topical Introduction.—The law relating to impartible estates has been casually referred to in the preceeding discussion whenever it became necessary to contrast and compare it with other species of property and rights.

The subject, however, forms an important branch of Hindu Law and merits separate treatment.

Impartible estates may owe their origin to (1) the sovereign grant, (2) law creating them, or (3) custom.

Hindu text books are silent on the subject of impartible estates, though they contain faint traces of that right out of which has been evolved the present law on the subject. Manu alludes to such a right in the following texts:—

Manu :—106 By the eldest, at the moment of his birth, the father, having begotten a son, discharges his debt to his own progenitors : the eldest son, therefore, ought before partition, to manage the whole patrimony.

119. Let them never divide the value of a single goat or sheep, or a single beast with uncloven hoofs ; a single goat or sheep remaining after an equal distribution belongs to the first born

125. As between sons, born of wives equal in their class and without any other distinction, there can be no seniority in right of the mother ; but the seniority ordained by the law, is according to the birth (1).

1595. Quoting the last text the Privy Council said : “ Now when it is said, that the single goat or sheep is to belong to one son, it is apparently for the same reason that a zamindari so descends, viz., that the subject is in its nature impartible, and therefore, the rule that is laid down with reference to one impartible subject, viz., that it belongs to the first-born, appears by reasonable and just implication, to be the rule applicable to all such subjects. And which of several sons is to be deemed to be the first-born is declared by S. 125 above cited. There can be no seniority in right of the mother, but the seniority ordained by law is according to birth.” (2)

1596. Impartible estates in their inception owe their existence to royal grants made for reasons which might have been political, military, religious or personal. Political grants were made from state policy to allies, servants and dependents for support and service. Military grants were made to vassal chiefs on condition of military service. Religious endowments were prompted by piety. They form an important branch of Hindu Law and form the subject of a separate chapter. Personal grants were service grants made to friends, servants and dependants, their duration depending on their nature and terms.

Incidents of impartible estate.

154. An impartible estate is subject to the following incidents:—

(1) The estate is held by one person at a time.

(1) Manu IX-106, 119, 125.

(2) Ramalakshmi v. Shivanatha, 14 M.

I. A. 570 (598).

(2) The holder for the time being is the sole owner of the estate which he may relinquish, transfer or devise in favour of any one at his discretion.

(3) Succession to the estate is ordinarily by primogeniture determined by the personal law adapted to the tenure.

(4) The successor takes the estate subject to the burdens created and the debts payable by his predecessor.

(5) The heir—apparent has merely a spes successionis which he cannot partition, transfer or devise, nor is it liable to be sold in execution of a decree against him.

(6) The sons and brothers of the holder are entitled to maintenance, the right of other relations to maintenance being determined by custom.

(7) The estate does not lose its incidents of impartibility by the mere discontinuance of service attaching thereto, or by the fact that it is regranted after confiscation.

Illustrations.

(a) A, B and C are three members of a joint family. An impartible estate is granted to A. It is A's separate property, though he remains joint with B and C as regards the other estate.

(b) In the last case A has sons D and E. On A's death his eldest son D will succeed to A's impartible estate and will be a co-parcener with B, C and E in the joint estate.

(c) A, B and C are members of a co-parcenary. A is the holder of an impartible estate. On his death the estate will devolve on his widow to the exclusion of B and C.

(d) A is the holder of an impartible estate. He becomes a rebel whereupon his estate is confiscated by Government who regrants it to his brother C. It remains an impartible estate in the hands of C.

(e) But if in the last case, the regrant is to "C and his heirs" then the estate loses its impartibility, for the "heir" of C cannot come in if the estate remain impartible.

(f) A obtains a service grant which is impartible. A discontinues the service. It does not affect the impartibility of his estate.

1597. Analogous Law.—The several clauses of this section are supported by the undernoted cases. (1)

Some of them are interdependant. As for instance, the first two clauses, though the rule stated in clause (2) was not readily recognized as flowing out of clause (1), it being held that the mere fact that the estate was subject to the law of impartibility did not destroy the co-parcenary rights of other members who, except for that incident, remained co-parceners in the estate and other members of the families were entitled to all other co-parcenary rights. Consequently, it was not open to the holder to alien his estate beyond his own life-time. This view was even taken by the Privy Council in its earlier cases <sup>(2)</sup> but their Lordships have now definitely affirmed against any right of co-parcenary in an impartible estate. <sup>(3)</sup> The other members of the family have then no right, not even the right of maintenance unless it is sanctioned by custom.

1598. As the holder is the absolute owner of the estate, it follows that he can alien or demise it at his discretion either to the next heir or to a rank outsider, unless the estate is also inalienable, in which case his power of alienation is subject to the rule already considered.

These and other clauses will now be more minutely examined.

1599. Single holder.—It is of the essence of an impartible estate that it must be held by a single person. Such person may be real or juridical, e.g., a corporation or an idol, but in each case the holder can have no partners or sharers, since partners or sharers possess the right of enforcing partition.

1600. Proof of impartibility.—An estate may become impartible by law, grant, or by its nature or custom.

1602. Of these, the Madras Act declares certain estates to be impartible, as to which it provides as follows: "The proprietor of an impartible estate shall be incapable of alienating or binding by his debts such estate or any part thereof beyond his own life-time unless the alienation shall be made, or the debt incurred, under circumstances which would entitle the managing member of a joint Hindu family, not being the father or grandfather of the other co-parceners, to make an alienation of the joint property, or incur a debt binding on the shares of the other co-parceners independent of their consent." <sup>(3)</sup>

1603. It will be noted that this section enacts a view of law which has since been definitely overruled by the Privy Council according to whose view there is no co-parcenary in an impartible estate the holder of which may alienate to any one at his discretion. But this contingency was present in the minds of the legislature who have added the following saving clause, "The Act shall not affect alienations made or debts incurred before the coming into force of this Act and shall cease to apply to estates or parts of estates which may hereafter be lawfully alienated otherwise than by temporary transfer."

1604. The Oudh Estates Act was intended to safeguard the impartibility of the Oudh Taluqdars to whom their previous estates had been regranted after the re-occupation of Oudh by the British Government after the mutiny in 1858. The estates are impartible and only alienable within limits, while succession to them is subject to the rule of primogeniture. <sup>(4)</sup>

1605. It has been held in Patna that there is a custom which has attained the status of a lex loci in Chota Nagpur that grants made by the Maharaja of Chota Nagpur are themselves impartible, and as regards succession, subject to the rule of primogeniture. This is the more so if the grantee is a relation. <sup>(5)</sup>

1606. Of the same kind though not belonging to the same class is the impartible tenure created by statute. Such is the tenure of a "protected Thekadar" under the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act <sup>(6)</sup> which constitutes it both impartible and inalienable. These subordinate estates are the creatures of contract, though their indivisibility is a creature of law. And so is their succession. In so far as they are impartible they will possess the same incidents except so far as they are varied by the statute creating them or the custom if any, modifying them.

1607. Again, an estate may be impartible by the terms and nature of the grant. It has already been stated that a person cannot alter the ordinary incidents of impartibility by transferring it to another on that condition. The subject has no

(6) S. 66 (4) (a), C. P. Land Rev. Act,

XVIII of 1881) re-enacted as S. 109 C.P. Act II of 1917. The view that co parsonary rights exist in such tenure taken in Engwa v. Budhram, 10 N. L. R. 64 is inconsistent with the view of the Privy Council in Ramrao v. Raja of Pittapur, 41 M. 778 P.C. and the provisions of the statute such right. (1) Where, therefore the estate was partible, the mere fact that the other members of the family treated it as impartible does not convert it into an impartible estate, (2) which is an anomalous estate and must be proved by evidence which is both clear and unambiguous. Where such estate was granted by a sanad the question is reduced to the examination of its terms.

1608. Where, however, the nature of the grant is a matter of inference, the question will often depend upon the nature of the grant and the intention of the grantor must be deduced from the correspondence preceding it and the subsequent conduct of the parties. These principles were put to the test in the case of the Hansapur zamindari, which was confiscated by the East India Company, and afterwards for 20 years the Government realized and appropriated its revenues, after which, as a matter of grace and favour, it was conferred on one Chattardharee Sahee, but upon what terms, it was not stated. As the Privy Council observed: "We have no evidence of the intention of the grantors except that which is to be collected from the proceedings and correspondence already referred to, nor have we any record of the proceedings before the Governor-General, or any means of knowing the precise grounds on which Lord Cornwallis's Government repeated the recommendation of the Board of Revenue and determined to confer the property on Chattardharee Sahee. Again, it cannot be denied that in these proceedings the term 'Raj' is never used, or that in some of them the subject of the grant is spoken of as 'the land in Hansapur which belonged to Raja Fattah Sahee.' On the other hand, there is no expressed intention to alter the nature of the tenure. The estate, whilst it was in the hands of the Company had never been broken up. The policy of the decennial settlement was to form a body of landholders by ascertaining in whom the zamindari interest in the soil actually was, and making with those persons a permanent settlement of the Government Revenue, so as to give them the greatest fixity of tenure. In the absence of all evidence to the contrary, it must be presumed, that the settlement was made precisely as it would have been made had the estate continued in the line of Raja Fattah Sahee, and therefore, that the subject conferred on Chattardharee Sahee was the old zamindari with all its incidents, excepting at most, its descendible quality. It seems to follow that the intention to alter that quality, if it existed, would have been expressed. Again, the selection of a member of the old family next in succession to the excluded line, though it cannot make ancestral that which was self-acquired, is a very strong circumstance in favour of the hypothesis that the intention of the Government was to restore the zamindari as it had existed before the confiscation or attachment, making no further change than was involved in the forfeiture of the rights of Raja Fattah Sahee and his descendants, and in the substitution by an act of power, of the person next in the order of succession, and consequently, that the transaction was not so much the creation of a new tenure, as the change of the tenant by the exercise of a vis major." (3)

1609. This case is then an authority for the proposition that the confiscation of an impartible estate by the paramount power, and its regrant to a member has not necessarily the effect of destroying its impartibility. It has been so held in several cases.<sup>(1)</sup> This was emphasised by the same tribunal in a case in which the estate in suit, which was originally impartible, was afterwards formally settled by the Government in 1814 in order that the character and rights of the poligar might be better defined by a sanad-i-milkat and in 1867 a sanad in common form was granted to the then poligar conferring on him the rights of a zamindar under Regulation XXV of 1802 in 65 villages named in the sanads which was expressed to be granted in lieu of all former privileges. It contained no clause as to impartibility but merely declared that the grantee continuing to perform the special stipulations, and to perform the duties of allegiance to the British Government, its laws and regulations, was thereby authorised and empowered to hold in perpetuity to his heirs, successors, and assigns at the permanent assessment therein named, the zamindari of Udayarpalayam. It was held that the conferral by the sanad in the common form had not of itself, and apart from other circumstances, the effect of destroying its pristine impartibility.<sup>(2)</sup>

If the estate was initially impartible, the mere fact that it was partitioned as an act of the paramount power or of rebellion does not destroy its impartibility.<sup>(3)</sup>

1610. Nor does the fact that such an estate is split up and re-granted to two separate relations has that effect. This was settled in the Bettia Raj case which was seized by the East India Company and the holder driven out of the country for acts of rebellion. Subsequently, they effected a division of the Raj estate, reinstating in one portion of it the heir of the former holder, and granting the other portion to members of another branch of the same family. The Privy Council followed the principle enunciated in the Hunsapur case and said: "The Government held itself at liberty to divide the Sirkar into two portions, and to grant one portion away from the heir of the former owner of the estate, and it was equally at liberty to grant the whole away from him, though from reasons of policy, it preferred to extend its favour to him in a certain measure. It cannot be doubted that the grant of the Maitu and Balera to Shrikishan and Alidhut was a direct exercise of sovereign authority and proceeded from grace and favour alone, and if so, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the reinstatement of the heir of Raja Jugal Kishore in a portion of his father's former estate also bore that character. Following the judgment of this Board in the Hunsapur case<sup>(4)</sup> their Lordships think that the present Bettia Raj must be taken to have been the separate and self-acquired property of Birshona Singh, though with all the incidents of the family tenure of the old estate as an impartible Raj."<sup>(5)</sup> In the Tamkoti Raj case the estate was situated in the two districts of Saran and Gorakhpur. After the battle of Buxar in 1764 the property in Saran was confiscated by the British Government but the Gorakhpur property was then in territory belonging to the Nawab Wazir of Oudh which was not ceded to the British Government until 1801. It was held that the confiscation of the Saran property did not affect the Gorakhpur property. It was further held that its impartibility was not affected by the fact that it was held by other relations in lieu of maintenance.<sup>(6)</sup>

1611. This raises the question whether maintenance grants carved out of impartible estates are also impartible. The question is again one of intention. If the subject of the grant was to remain in the grantor, the grantee only getting the benefit of the usufruct for maintenance, it is clear that neither is the incident of the property altered nor are the grantees even entitled to partition inter se.<sup>(1)</sup> But it does not thence follow that the grant is by reason of this fact inalienable <sup>(2)</sup> unless, of course, the grant was limited to the grantee personally. But where the grant is intended to or has the effect of conveying an estate in land, a separate and independent estate comes into existence and as all property is prima facie partible, it becomes equally partible since the incident of impartibility which attached to the parent estate does not persist in all derivative estates carved out therefrom. <sup>(3)</sup> But as will be presently seen such estate may also be customarily impartible. Such are the jagirs granted by the Maharaja of Chota Nagpur where such custom has attained the notoriety of a lex loci. <sup>(4)</sup>

1612. An estate may be shown to be impartible by custom in which case the custom alleged must be strictly proved unless it is so notorious as to have passed into a lex loci of which the court will take judicial notice. Such a custom was found to exist in Chota Nagpur where all grants made by the Maharaja of Chota Nagpur, whether to relations or to outsiders, are presumably impartible, more especially if they are in favour of a relation, and subject to the rule of descent by primogeniture. <sup>(5)</sup> But where custom has to be proved, it must be of course, proved by clear evidence. And except in the case of Rajas of ancient families, the courts are loath to admit a custom in favour of impartibility. As the Privy Council observed: "There is no doubt that the general law with respect to inheritance as well as with respect to other matters, may in the case of great families, where it is shown that the usage has prevailed for a very long series of years, be controlled, unless there be positive law to the contrary."<sup>(6)</sup> Referring to this case, the Bombay court observed: "I apprehend that the same law would unhesitatingly be applied to some classes of Thakurs and chiefs in this Presidency, among whom, by settled custom, the principality descends indivisible to the eldest son. But it would be a dangerous doctrine that any petty family—and in the case under consideration a third of the family property is valued for the purpose of the suit at little more than Rs. 500—is at liberty to make a law for itself, and thus to set aside the general law of the country."<sup>(7)</sup> To put it differently, the custom of impartibility can only be annexed to estates of the nature of Raj: it cannot be attached to any petty estate.

estate is of the nature of a Raj in which one person alone is the Gaddinashin. This was pointed out by the Privy Council in two cases in one of which Lord Hobhouse said: "The other remark is a suggestion that there is no necessary connection between Gaddinashini and primogeniture. That may be so; but it is impossible to read the evidence without seeing that witnesses on both sides treat the two as identical or the former as proving the latter. Not a single question is put to any witness who has affirmed or denied Gaddinashini for the purpose of disconnecting it from primogeniture. . . . Their Lordships think that when the witnesses affirm or deny Gaddinashini they mean to affirm or deny primogeniture; and their constant identification of the two things shows how closely they are connected in the minds of the families of that part of the country. The custom of Gaddinashini has clearly an important bearing on that of primogeniture though the connection between them may not be a necessary one." (1) In another case their Lordships quoted this passage and the following from the judgment of the Allahabad High Court over which they were sitting in appeal: "In order to constitute that a valid argument it ought to have been shown not only that Gaddinashini and the presentations of nazars was the ordinary concomitant of the possession of an impartible Raj but also that it was an exclusive attribute of families in whom the custom of primogeniture prevails." (2) The nature of the evidence necessary to establish a custom has already been discussed (S. 9).

1614. It will suffice if some cases are here passed in review to indicate generally the evidence which the court treats as sufficient and that which it rejects as insufficient.

The following case illustrates the difficulty which besets the proof of custom. The plaintiff sued his brother for partition of the family estate. The defendant pleaded a privilegium in his family of inheritance by primogeniture. The Subordinate Judge who tried the case found such custom proved. The High Court held it not proved. The evidence adduced to prove it comprised an entry in the wajibularz, the early history of the family contained in an official publication and oral evidence of witnesses who gave it as their opinion that the estate was impartible. The High Court dismissed them with the remark that they were either interested or depended upon the wajibularz. Accordingly they decreed the claim; but on appeal the Privy Council reversed them holding the custom proved by the following facts:—

(1) That for a period of nearly 80 years from the time of the British occupation, the enjoyment had been consistent with the alleged custom.

(2) That as such, for three generations, there had been successive descents of the estate to an eldest son.

(3) There had been a persistent tradition of impartibility of the estate.

(4) The evidence of 56 witnesses who gave it as their independent opinion based on hearsay but not mere repetition of hearsay. Though the oral evidence without the other facts would not have sufficed to establish custom it corroborated these facts which went far to prove it. In the result they held the custom proved and dismissed the suit with costs. (8) In another case they upheld a similar custom in favour of lineal primogeniture on the following evidence:—(i) judgments in three cases in which the custom was held proved; (ii) oral evidence on both sides which declared that there was such a tradition in the family; (iii) a procedure conferred or marked by the titles of honour given to the sons of the holder; (iv) opinions of defendant's witnesses who supported his plea of impartibility by an expression of their opinion as to his family and the families belonging to the same group. On the other hand, there was the record of heirs stated in an official document by a late holder on the requisition of the authorities of that time. The High Court upheld the custom and the Privy Council upheld the High Court mainly relying upon the judgments and the special marks of respect shown to the sons of the holder. Referring to the judgments, their Lordships said: "These decrees do not, of course, bind the parties to the present suit, but they go a long way to show the prevalence of the custom among families having a common origin and settled in the same part of the country." (1) The appellant pressed the declaration of heirs made in the official record; but their Lordships admitted its importance but declined to accept it as laying down any positive rule of succession in the family.

1615. The court is justified in inferring custom from a uniform practice lasting for a considerable period. So where it was found that the practice in a Deshphande vatan had been for a century and a half without interruption or dispute of any kind whatever, to have the performance of the services of the vatan and the bulk of the property in the hands of the elder branch, the younger branches being provided only with maintenance, the court held the practice as more probably due in its origin to a family or local usage, than a mere arrangement determinable at the will of any members of the family. (2)

1616. It is held by the Privy Council (3) and it is enacted in S. 110 of the Evidence Act that where a person is found in possession of land receiving rent and paying revenue, he is presumed to be its owner and as such entitled to exercise all the rights incident to the ownership. As Sir Barnes Peacock said: "In England proof of the possession of land or the receipt of rent from the person in possession is prima facie evidence of a seizin in fee. In India the proof of possession or of receipt of rent by a person who pays the land revenue immediately to Government is prima facie evidence of an estate of inheritance in the case of an ordinary zamindari. The evidence is still stronger if it be proved that the estate has passed on one or more occasions from ancestor to heir. There is no difference in this respect between a polliam (or a Jagir) and an ordinary zamindari. The only difference between a polliam or zamindari which is permanently settled and one that is not is that, in the former, the Government is precluded for ever from raising the revenue: and in the latter, the Government may or may not have that power." (4)

1617. Where all the lines of evidence, of differing degrees of value, converged towards the same result, viz., the existence of a custom impartibility and of primogeniture, the Privy Council held the custom established, adding "Perhaps no one of them would, if standing alone, be conclusive in favour of the defendant's case; but taken as a whole they are conclusive." case is instructive. The plaintiff, a younger son, sued for partition his brother, who claimed to succeed to his father's estate by primogeniture. The parties were Rajputs and the property in suit a village of which the plaintiff claimed a third share valued at Rs. 47,125. The evidence adduced in support of impartibility was as follows:—

(1) Former claim to partition made by a junior member, which was referred to an arbitrator who held the estate impartible, but made a division of the property between the claimants. The High Court found that this award was treated as a dead letter.

(2) The ceremonial of Gaddinashini.

(3) Entries in the wajibularz to the effect that the head of the family held the office of the lambardar.

(4) The evidence of the genealogist which proved the pedigree.

(5) Oral evidence of relations, with the exception of actual claimants, in favour of the custom.

The Subordinate Judge who tried the case dismissed the suit holding the custom proved. On appeal the High Court held the custom not established, but their decree was in turn reversed by the Privy Council who held the custom made out; and to the several items of evidence adverted upon by the High Court replied to the following effect: (1) The High Court had held the award inoperative, but their Lordships held that the more material fact was that it held the estate impartible. (2) As to the Gaddinashini ceremony, the High Court while admitting its performance on two occasions attenuated its significance by remarking that it was probably invented to lend colour to the custom alleged. The Privy Council held that there was nothing to suggest the faking of this evidence. (3) As regards the wajibularz entries the High Court dismissed them with the remark that the choice of lambardar had nothing to do with the succession to the estate. To this their Lordships replied: "A lambardar represents the estate in all transactions with the Government. It is of importance that he should be of capacity for business, and it is usual in a joint family to appoint one of the elder members of the family. When it is found that the office devolves by primogeniture in a family (and there is no suggestion that the wajibularz speaks falsely) it seems to their Lordships a material circumstance to aid the conclusion that the estate devolves in the same way in the family." (4) As to the evidence of the genealogist, the High Court held that it proved the pedigree but did not prove the custom. The Privy Council, however, observed that though they hesitated to attach importance to expressions therein, such as "succeeded to the Gaddi" or the title of "Rao" prefixed to the head of each generation, still Bhairon represented with fidelity the traditions and belief in the Umargarh family, and that the family was a noble one of very long standing in the country. As to the oral evidence their Lordships held that it at least proved a persistent tradition and taken all in all, supported the custom. The High Court had referred to the plaintiff's evidence against its existence. But to this their Lordships remarked: "The High Court say that the plaintiff's witnesses must have known of the custom if it had existed, and ought to be believed. But people who knew nothing of the gaddi custom or of actual installations are not likely to have known or cared anything about the custom of inheritance. There need be no imputation of their veracity, for, with the exception of Hari Ram, they only speak to negatives, and are guilty of nothing worse than the common error of assuming the non-existence of that which is not known to them." (1)

1618. It need scarcely be added that where it is sought to prove a custom in one family by proof of custom in another family, the two families must be shown to belong to one group or otherwise connected by relationship or territorial affinity. (2)

1620. Now as there is a distinction between the public and the private property of a Hindu sovereign, his Raj and the public property going to the succeeding Rajah, while his personal and private property going to another set of heirs, the same distinction was observed in the case of the smaller chieftainships. (3) Impartible estates are variously called. They are known as Raj in the North and Polliam in the South. But an estate may be impartible though it is neither. (4) Some of these are called Jagirs or Inams, others Taluqs or Tahuts, while in some parts they pass by the title of zamindars.

1621. Of these the Jagirs (5) occupy an important place in the land tenures of India. "The Mogal Empire recognized a definite portion of its own dominions as that which was directly managed by the Emperor's officers, and another area as that available for the assignment of the revenue spoken of. And when certain offices or titles were conferred, a fixed grant went with them as an appanage. Such grants were called Jagire. They were at first always for life, and resumable with the office. Nearly all later Governments have adopted the 'Jagir' but chiefly to support troops, or to reward a service of some kind.

(5) Contracted from Jai-land and Gir holder, i.e., landholder.

They are still granted by our own Government, but as a reward for services in the past, and not with the obligation of military service. In time it was thought beneath the dignity of the ruler to resume, and so the grant became permanent and hereditary. Possibly this stage was hastened by the fact that the Government—both Hindu and Mahomedan—had always been accustomed to grant smaller holdings of land, free of revenue, to pious purposes, to support temples, mosques, schools, or bridges and tanks, and these were called 'inam' or 'muafi' and were usually hereditary and permanent as long as the object was fulfilled. As the inam was permanent, so the Jagir grew to be so in many cases. Possibly, also, it was the decline of power which caused jagirs to be irregularly granted, and thus to become permanent. When a disorganized Government desires to reward a worthy (or an unworthy) servant, it generally has its treasury empty, and the easiest plan (though true policy would suggest a cash pension for life or lives) would be to give a man a grant by way of assignment, and allow him to collect what revenue he could off the area." (1)

Jagirs were at times also clearance leases with the express object that the grantees should settle the waste.

Where however the Jagirs were granted as a reward for military or other service they were naturally personal and impartible in their character but the fact whether they retained or lost their impartibility, depended upon their subsequent history.

1622. Ordinarily, a Jagir is the grant of the royal share of the revenue and not of the soil, and is presumed to enure only for the life of the grantee. Unless it is a grant to the grantee "and his heirs" there is nothing to control the ordinary meaning of words, in which case he takes an absolute interest. The principle that Jagirs are to be considered life tenures only "unless otherwise expressed in the grant" was expressly laid down in the Bengal Regulations (3) and is the law in other parts of India. (4) So Melvill, J. had held in an earlier case that "the grant in Jagir or Saranjam was very rarely a grant of the soil, and the burden of proving that it was in any particular case a grant of the soil lay very heavily upon the party alleging it." (5)

1623. In this respect a Jagir and a Saranjam differ from an Inam which is a grant of the soil and is generally alienable at the pleasure of the holder. (6)

Where the Jagir is merely a life estate it follows that it is not liable in the hands of a successor in title for the mortgage debts of his predecessor (7)

And being a personal tenure, it is not partible.

Where a Jagir is granted in perpetuity and partakes of the nature of a Raj, it retains its incident of impartibility unless there is anything in the grant to make it partible.

1624. It has been said that a mere regrant does not make an impartible estate partible unless the intention to make it partible is clearly expressed. Such a case was decided by the Privy Council upon the following facts. In 1783 an impartible zamindari in the Madras Presidency was confiscated by the Government on account of the rebellion of the zamindar. In the following year it was restored to the eldest son of the former zamindar as it existed prior to the confiscation. In 1793 the estate was again resumed by the Government for arrears of revenue and in 1802 two new zamindaris were carved out of it one of which was granted to the second son of the zamindar, who was deprived of possession in 1783 at a fixed revenue. The sanad by which it was granted contained inter alia the following clause:—"You shall be at liberty to transfer, without the previous consent of Government or any other authority, to whomsoever you may think proper, either by gift, sale, or otherwise your proprietary right in the whole or any part of your zamindari continuing to perform the above stipulations, and to perform the duties of allegiance to Government, you are hereby authorized and empowered to hold in perpetuity to your heirs, successors, and assigns, at the permanent assessment herein named." It was held that the words "heirs" used in the sanad must mean the heirs of the grantee, according to the ordinary rules of inheritance of the Hindu Law, and that the estate so granted was no longer impartible and subject to primogeniture. "If the Government had intended to make the estate impartible, and to limit the succession to a single heir according to the rule of primogeniture, instead of to the heirs of the grantee, according to the rule of Hindu Law, there is no doubt they would have expressed their intention in unambiguous language." (1)

1625. Their Lordships fortified their conclusion by adverting to the fact that there was no state policy which required that the new estate should be indivisible. "In the former state of things indivisibility and impartibility and descent to a single heir were the ancient nature of the tenure, and with good reason when the estate was subject to military service, and under the Government of a chieftain, and was in the nature of a Raj or principality, but when the ancient zamindari was resumed and two new estates were created out of it, of which the zamindars ceased to be liable to military service or to be independent chiefs, but held merely as ordinary zamindars subject to the payment of a fixed assessment of revenue, there was no reason why the rule of impartibility or descendibility to a single heir, according to the rule of primogeniture should be extended to the newly created estates." (2) Of course if in this case the estate had been restored entire without any qualifying words in the regrant then the estate would have continued to retain its ancient attribute of impartibility though it was no longer supported by any state policy. (3) Even the grant of a sanad to "Padmatur . . . to be the present zamindar of Shivgunga; and the said Governor in Council hereby requires and commands all the inhabitants of Shivgunga to respect the rights and authority of the said Padmatur" would not detract from its pristine impartibility. (4)

Parganas latterly recognized as chiefs of the areas over which they had become established. For a time they served as a frontier police. Their tenure is in part regulated by the statutory law and varies so much that it is not possible to generalize upon their modern incidents. Ordinarily, however, they are perpetual holdings subject to the condition of service. (1) They are in the nature of jagirs which, though hereditary are not subject to the ordinary rules of inheritance according to Hindu or the Mahomedan law but are subject to the condition of recognition by the Government. As such they are incapable of partition upon the death of the holder and alienation during his life. (2)

Succession to a Ghatwal is by primogeniture (7)

1628. A Ghatwal tenure is as regards its alienability subject to variable incidents. For instance such a tenure in Kharagpur is not inalienable, and may be transferred by the Ghatwal or sold in execution of a decree against him, if such transfer or sale is assented to by the zamindar. And when once it is established that the ghatwal had the power of alienation, that power forms an integral portion of his right and interest in the Ghatwali, and must not, in the absence of evidence, be limited to an alienation for his own life and no longer. (8)

1629. Saranjams. (9)---Saranjams are jagirs, and as such ordinarily imply the grant of the royal share of the revenue and not of the soil. (10) They were originally grants of jagirs granted for the support of troops. They were confined to the Nasik and Khandesh districts in the Northern and to the south Maratha country. No condition of service being required, they have been commuted to a money payment; and the grant is a personal distinction for life or lives, or in perpetuity as the case may be. (11) A Saranjam given for the support of a distinguished family is generally in its nature impartible and inalienable. (12)

1630. Vatan.—A vatan was a grant of land made by the sovereign in lieu of service. As such it was a service-grant, and was both impartible and subject to the law of primogeniture. A vatan was a public office. As in the case of the other service tenures, the vatan tenure became hereditary without retaining its initial association with service. So where it was found that in a Deshpande vatan, for over 150 years the performance of the services of the vatan and the bulk of the property was confined to the elder branch, the younger branch being provided only with maintenance, it was held that such practice being more probably due in its origin to a family or local usage, than a mere arrangement determinable at the will of any members of the family, ought to be recognised and acted upon as a legal and valid custom. (1)

1631. The Taluquaders of Oudh like the Subedars of the South were at first officials and afterwards lessees of the tracts or taluqs from which they were authorised to collect land revenue for payment into the royal treasury. (2) They are now subject to statutory control. (3)

1632. Polliam.—An impartible estate is known as a Raj in Northern India, while it is called a Polliam in the Southern Peninsula. (4) This term was thus defined by the Privy Council: A Polliam is in the nature of a Raj; it may belong to an undivided family; but it is not the subject of partition; it can be held by only one member of the family at a time, who is styled the Poligar, the other members of the family being entitled to a maintenance or allowance out of the estate." (5) The polligars were originally petty chieftains occupying hilly or forest tracts and nominally owing allegiance and paying tribute and service to the paramount power, but really free of outside control. On the transfer of the government of the country to the British, the Polliams were settled but though naturally impartible, their other incidents do not appear to have been clearly defined. So quoting the High Court, the Privy Council said "The existence of a proprietary estate in polliams or other lands not permanently assessed, and the tenure by which it has been held, are in our opinion matters judicially determinable on legal evidence, just as the right to any other property." (6)

1633. Impartible rights.—Personal rights are naturally impartible. Such is the right of a priest to serve his yajamans (7) though the acquisitions made by him might be partible. (8) The Patam or office of dignity in a family governed by the Aliyasantana Law is indivisible and whether the family be divided or not, in the absence of any arrangement made for its devolution, the Pattam descends to the eldest male of the surviving members of the family. 1634. Personal property of impartible holder.—The rule of impartibility applicable to zamindaris does not extend to the personal property of the zamindar left at his death, which is divisible amongst his co-parceners in accordance with the ordinary law. (1)

The question whether an estate is partible or impartible is a mixed question of law and fact. (2)

1635. Holder sole owner.—The history of this clause has been already given (§§ 1597-1598). It is now settled by the court of ultimate appeal that in impartible properties there is no co-parcenary. (3) The contrary had been laid down previously in some cases (4) But this position was abandoned in 1888 when the Privy Council definitely laid down the contrary. (5) and this view has been confirmed by that high tribunal in several cases. Sartaj Kuari's case is thus a land mark in the history of impartible estates cutting as it does at the very root of all previous decisions on the subject. Even in some later cases the same view was reiterated (6) but all these must be taken to have been overruled by the view reaffirmed by the Privy Council against the succession by personal law. But though the estate is held by a single person in his individual right with no co-parcenary interest in the other relations, the law of succession is ordinarily the personal law of the holder varied by the impartible nature of the estate which is customarily subject to the rule of primogeniture. But this is only the ordinary and not the invariable rule, there being always no possibility of any co-parcenary rights existing as regards an impartible estate.

It then follows that there can be no devolution by survivorship and that succession to the estate must, as a rule, follow the custom which brings such estate into existence.

1636. Succession by primogeniture determined by personal law.—

Cl. (3). But though the estate is held by a single person in his individual right with no co-parcenary interest in the other relations, the law of succession is ordinarily the personal law of the holder varied by the impartible nature of the estate which is customarily subject to the rules of primogeniture. But this is only the ordinary and not the invariable rule, it being always a matter of evidence in each case as to what is the governing rule of succession. In one case it was said: "According to the decision in the Shivunga case which as their Lordships understand, is not now disputed, the fact of the Raj being impartible does not affect the rule of succession. In considering who is to succeed on the death of the Raja, the rules which govern the succession to a partible estate are to be looked at, and therefore, the question in this case is, what would be the right of succession supposing instead of being an impartible estate it were a partible one." (1) On the strength of this case the Madras court deduced the following principles: "The first of them, is that a rule of succession in regard to succession to impartible property is to be found in the Mitakshara law applicable to partible property, subject to such modifications as naturally flow from the character of the property as an impartible estate. The second principle is that the only modifications which impartibility suggests in regard to the right of succession is the existence of a special rule for the selection of a single heir, when there are several heirs of the same class who would be entitled to succeed to the property if it were partible under the general Hindu Law. We have first to ascertain the class—, and we have next to select a single heir by applying the special rule." (2) Though the rule of primogeniture generally guides the descent of impartible estate, yet a family usage of selection without reference to that rule may be established by evidence (3)

1637. For the purpose of determining the heir the estate must be regarded as the self-acquisition of the holder. On his death, his eldest son, and if he dies without male issue, his widow and not his collateral, will succeed to his estate. (4) Women are not precluded by any rule of descent from succeeding to an impartible estate (5) though they may be excluded by custom. But whoever relies upon such custom must prove it. (6) The holder is entitled to adopt a son but the adopted son acquires no greater right in the estate than the natural son. (7)

1638. Where an impartible estate becomes vested in the daughter's son of the original holder, it will devolve on his death on his own son and not on another daughter's son of the original holder. There is no authority for the contention that when an impartible estate becomes obstructed by being vested in a female heir, it becomes always obstructed heritage, so that on the death of each succeeding holder (whether male or female) the true successor is the heir of the original unobstructed owner. (8)

1639. Successor pays debts.—As regards the incumbrances and debts of the holder they must be discharged by the successor in accordance with the equitable maxim, that he who takes the benefit must also bear the burden. But this rule does not solve all the questions that may arise in practice. For instance:—(i) Is the successor's liability to pay the debts of his predecessor unlimited or to any extent limited; (ii) Is he for instance, entitled to show with the son that his predecessor had incurred the debts for an illegal or immoral purpose; (iii) Is his liability limited to the extent of the personal assets of the late holder; (iv)

Is there any difference between the secured and the unsecured debts. All these questions have become somewhat further complicated by the changed view of the court as regards the nature of the estate. Cases which were decided in the light of previous cases which classes an impartible estate as a species of joint property and the holder a life tenant, must necessarily be now applied with caution. The earlier Madras view, since overruled, was that since the holder was merely a life tenant his successor was not liable to pay his debts even if they were legal and secured by a decree and the successor was his son. <sup>(1)</sup> But in a later case Muttuswami Aiyar, J. supported this view as follows: "It seems to us that a zamindar represents the estate during his life for all practical purposes, and that after his death, since it has been decided that the estate does not constitute assets which can be seized in execution, it is open to the creditor by a separate suit to enforce the debt, so far as it is binding on him against the successor. The effect of recent decisions is that a son, even in his father's life-time, is debarred from setting up that the whole undivided ancestral property is not liable for his father's first debts, but it is only after the father's death, when the whole estate has passed to him by survivorship, that he is under a distinct obligation to discharge the debt out of it." <sup>(2)</sup> When the holder's interest was sold in execution of a decree against him the purchaser was held to acquire only the life-interest of his judgment debtor. <sup>(3)</sup> Even the Privy Council had to accede to this view in a case decided in 1903 in conformity with the view current in 1876 when the holder's right title and interest was sold on the ground that the rights of the parties to a contract are to be judged by that law by which they intended, or rather by which they may justly be presumed to have bound themselves. <sup>(4)</sup>

1640. But as already observed the status of the holder of an impartible estate was materially altered by the exposition of law in Sartaj Kuwari's case <sup>(5)</sup> which laid down the following principles:--

(1) That there is no co-parcenary in an impartible estate, the holder of which is the absolute owner for the time being.

(2) That an estate may be impartible, but it is not necessarily inalienable. Its inalienability depends upon the nature of the tenure or custom.

(3) That succession to an impartible estate is regulated by custom dependant upon the nature of the tenure, or by the personal law modified to suit an impartible tenure.

1641. This case pointed only to one conclusion, namely that the successor must pay all lawful debts whether secured or unsecured of the late holder. But the courts do not appear to be agreed on the subject; for while this view has been taken in some cases the contrary has been also laid down in other cases which follow the view of the estate which is no longer tenable.

(5) Sartaj Kuwari v. Deoraj, 10 A. 272 P. C.

1642. In these cases it has been held that since the heir succeeds to an impartible estate by the law of survivorship he takes it free of all debt since the successor does not inherit his predecessor's estate nor can he be chargeable with his liability. <sup>(1)</sup> These conflicting views were partially justified by the conflicting views of the nature of an impartible estate taken by the Privy Council. That high tribunal has, however, now settled the nature of such estates, the result of which is to simplify the liability of the successor for the debts of his predecessor, the rule being that the successor is liable to pay all lawful debts of the previous holder whether secured or unsecured and whether or not supported by legal necessity.

1643. Though the execution of a promissory note by the previous holder might suggest prima facie that the creditor looked to his personal credit, it is still competent to him to show that the estate was intended to be equally bound. <sup>(2)</sup>

In one case it was held that where the undivided brother succeeded to a zamindari, he was not liable for his predecessor's debts, since he must be deemed to have succeeded to it by a mode of devolution resembling survivorship and that therefore the estate in his hands could not be treated as assets for the payment of the unsecured debts of the last holder. <sup>(3)</sup> But in view of the fact now settled that there can be no succession to an impartible estate by survivorship, this view of the successor's liability can no longer be maintained.

1644. Spes successionis.—From the fact that the holder is the absolute owner of the estate it follows that his successor has Cl. (5). nothing but an expectancy or a spes successionis which is not property within the contemplation of law so as to be the subject of partition or alienation. <sup>(4)</sup>

1645. Right of members to maintenance.—So long as an impartible Cl. (6). estate was held to be the subject of co-parcenary rights the courts were bound to hold that all co-parceners were entitled to maintenance. <sup>(5)</sup> But the Privy Council have now settled down to a conclusion that there is no co-parcenary in an impartible estate. As such the members of the holder's family have no legal claim to maintenance. Any claim they may have must be founded on custom, which recognizes the claim of sons and brothers. But in the case of other relations it must be proved. So their Lordships said: "Their Lordships do not doubt that the right of sons to maintenance in an impartible zamindari has been so often recognized that it would not be necessary to prove that custom in each case." <sup>(6)</sup> And the same rule would apply to the brothers. <sup>(7)</sup> But "we can find no invariable or certain custom that any below the first generation from the last Raja can claim maintenance as a right." <sup>(8)</sup> Their right to maintenance must then depend upon custom which must be alleged and proved. The amount of maintenance of the members must be proportionate to their wants and their position in life. (1)

1646. Maintenance grants.—The question of maintenance suggests another question—that of maintenance grants. The holder of an impartible and inalienable estate is not precluded from making grants of land in perpetuity (2) of subordinate tenures which may be both alienable and heritable. The question is one of construction and intention. But a maintenance grant is presumably intended to continue only for the life of the grantee, such intention being presumable from the object of it which was only the grantee's maintenance. It will be so even if in certain documents connected with the grant, the grantee was described as "proprietor" and as holding "for ever." (3)

1647. Custom sometimes modifies the terms of a grant by superadding to it incidents of its own. So when the proprietor of Chota Nagpur Raj granted a village to a priest by a sanad which provided that the grantee and his "al aulad" (descendants) were to possess and enjoy the property, it was held that though the term "al aulad" would etymologically include both the female as well as the male descendants, yet according to the custom proved to have prevailed at the time of the grant and subsequently in that part of the country, the words must be interpreted to mean lineal male descendants only. (4) In some cases as in the case of grants by the Maharaja of Chota Nagpur (5) or the Maharaja of Darbhanga (6) the grants are themselves impartible.

1648. In the absence of family usage or custom, a maintenance grant is alienable. (7) A maintenance grant to the grantor's sons and his descendants is ancestral property in the hands of the grantee, so that the latter cannot alienate it to the detriment of his descendants except as allowed by law. (8) (For further information on the subject of maintenance, see Ch. VII.)

The word "grant" as used in legal transactions in India is not to be understood in its technical English meaning of a conveyance at common law of remainders, reversions and incorporeal hereditaments which do not lie in livery or of which livery could not be given. (9)

1649. Discontinuance of service.—A service estate does not cease to be impartible by discontinuance of the service attaching thereto. In fact a large number of existing impartible estates were at one time held on service tenures; but their release from service does not alter their established incident of impartibility. (10) Nor does the fact that the estate was regranted after its confiscation by Government suffice to alter its impartibility unless that incident was altered expressly or by necessary implication.

155. (1) An impartible estate is not necessarily inalienable, though it may be so created by the terms of the grant, law, or custom.

Inalienable estate.

(2) He who alleges its inalienability must prove it.

(3) Where an estate is alienable, the extent of its alienability must be determined by the law or custom which creates it.

1650. Analogous Law -- Though estates which are impartible are also at times inalienable, inalienability is not a necessary adjunct of impartibility and it cannot be inferred from the mere absence of alienation without any evidence of facts which would make it probable that an alienation would have been made. (1) Inalienability may be inferred from some speciality in the tenure. (2)

1651. An estate inalienable by custom may be alienated for necessity. (8) It has been held by a long series of decisions that the zamindaris in the Madras Presidency are alienable as well as impartible. As such the court will presume alienability without proof of a custom to that effect. (4) The Ghatwali tenures are impartible, but while those in the Khargpur district are alienable (5) those elsewhere are inalienable. (6)

156. (1) Property acquired by the holder of an impartible estate out of its income does not partake of its character but is his self-acquisition unless it is intentionally incorporated with it.

(2) An accretion so made to an impartible estate also becomes impartible.

Illustration.

A the holder of an impartible Raj acquires mouzas B, C, and D out of its income. B, C, and D, are managed by the same staff and their collection papers kept with those of the Raj. This is insufficient to show A's intention to treat B, C, and D as a part of his Raj.

1652. Analogous Law.—All acquisitions made by the holder of an impartible estate do not necessarily become a part of his impartible estate. Prima facie they are his self-acquisitions and as such follow the rule applicable to self-acquired property. (1) In order to constitute accessions to the impartible estate, they must be intentionally incorporated with it. Such intention might be ascribed to one who left the acquisition undisposed of in his life-time. (2) As the holder may incorporate his acquisitions with the parent estate at any time at his discretion, it follows that while he is alive, he is entitled to treat them as one or the other. But there is a presumption that he intends to keep his acquisitions separate. And the mere fact that he managed them through his Raj servants or had the account papers of the one maintained with the other does not shew his intention to incorporate when they become accretions to the Raj and acquire all its incidents.

1653. Where however they remain unincorporated they will descend to the heirs of the holders in accordance with the normal personal law to which he is subject. (3)

ably partible.

157. (1) All property is presumably partible and alienable.

(2) Impartibility and inalienability are the incidents of an estate which must be pleaded and proved in each case.

1654. Analogous Law.—When we see the vast body of property around us which is both partible and alienable, law naturally presumes in favour of the general partibility and alienability of all property. Impartibility and inalienability being exceptional and confined only to a few estates, must be proved whenever it is challenged in each case. So it is now enacted in S. 6 of the Transfer of Property Act as follows: "Property of any kind may be transferred except as otherwise provided by this Act or by any other law for the time being in force."

1655. The impartible and inalienable estates owe their existence to the feudal tenures created by the sovereign power for past and future services. But of recent years law has declared several estates to be impartible and inalienable, while in other cases, the same incidents have become attached to certain estates by custom.

1656. An estate may be impartible though not inalienable and it may be inalienable though not impartible. The question of inalienability again depends upon the nature of the tenure, law or custom, (1) since a custom may be general, local, or one confined only to the estate in question. (2)

1657. These incidents cannot be engrafted upon an estate by contract or compromise which is void as being opposed to public policy. (3) The fact that parties have treated the estate as impartible and as such have not partitioned it for six or seven generations does not deprive the members of the family of their rights of partition. (4)

The question whether an estate is impartible is a mixed question of law and fact (5) (§ 387).

CHAPTER XIII.

SUCCESSION TO IMPARTIBLE ESTATE.

158. In the absence of any law or custom to the contrary, succession to an impartible estate is subject to the personal law of the holder adapted to the nature of the tenure to the following extent:—

(1) Succession is subject to the rule of primogeniture.

(2) Where the holder is subject to the Mitakshara law, the heir is the eldest male issue of the deceased or failing him the eldest co-parcener.

(3) Where it passes by survivorship from one line of descent to another, it devolves not on the co-parcener nearest in blood but on the nearest co-parcener of the senior line.

(4) Females are presumably excluded from succession in favour of co-parceners if the estate is ancestral, but if it is a separate acquisition of the holder they are entitled to succeed.

(5) In a case subject to the Dayabhag school the heir is the eldest member of the class of persons who are the next heirs of the deceased.

Explanation.—In the absence of custom determining seniority according to the seniority of the mother, seniority in age amongst brothers alone determines the seniority, irrespective of the seniority of the mother.

(NOTE.—In the following illustrations A must be understood to be the owner of an impartible estate).

1658. Analogous Law.—In describing the incidents of an impartible estate it has been stated that succession thereto is subject to the personal law of the holder adapted to the tenure. The one incident of impartibility carries with it another necessary incident as to its succession being subject to the rule of primogeniture. To this extent the personal law must necessarily stand modified. Partibility being the general rule, the succession of one heir is therefore an exception. (1) This section lays down the salient principles as regards succession. All the clauses are drawn from the decided cases. (2)

1659. The explanation is moreover supported by the following text :—

Manu :—105. As between sons born of wives equal in their class and without any other distinction, there can be no seniority in right of the mother but the seniority ordained by law is according to the birth. (3)

1660. Succession to impartible estate.—Succession to an impartible estate in the Mitakshara country is not by inheritance but by survivorship. (4) "When an estate is impartible it is enjoyed in a different mode from that prescribed by the ordinary Hindu Law, but the inheritance is to be traced by the same mode unless some further family custom exists beyond the custom of impartibility." (5) As observed in the Shivgunga case, "In the absence of proof of a special custom of descent, the succession to a zamindari impartible and capable of enjoyment by one member only of the family at a time, is governed by the general Hindu Law prevalent in that part of India with such qualifications only as flow from the impartible character of the subject." (6) The question then is, who is the heir ?

Where there is a single heir alive at the death of the last owner, he will succeed to the estate; but where there are several heirs equally related to him, they cannot all succeed, since if they did the estate could not continue impartible, since partibility is a necessary incident of joint ownership. An impartible estate can therefore be held only by one person at a time and he must be selected out of the body of heirs who would take a share if the estate were partible. Such selection is ordinarily based on the rule of primogeniture, that is the eldest male relation of the deceased becomes entitled to inherit the estate. But primogeniture may be general or lineal. Now since impartibility is the creature of law or usage, it must equally determine the rule of succession and whether it is one or the other, cannot be the subject of any a priori reasoning. It must depend upon the nature of the grant and the law or custom which regulates its succession, in the absence of which the general law must apply. As this law does not exclude women from succession, there is no inconsistency between a custom of impartibility and the right of females to inherit and the general law will prevail unless it is proved that they are excluded by custom. (1) That custom may shew what is the rule of succession, if it is by primogeniture, general or lineal, the one favours succession by proximity of degree (2) while the other limits succession to the eldest member of the senior line. In the one case nearness of blood and in the other nearness in line, is the ground of preference—that is to say while in the one case one nearer in blood though belonging to the junior line is preferred, while in the other, succession goes to the eldest in the senior line without reference to the nearest in blood. It is settled in accordance with the rulings of the Privy Council that when impartible property passes by survivorship from one line to another it devolves not on the co-parcener nearest in blood but on the nearest co-parcener of the senior line. (3) The question whether an estate is subject to the ordinary law of succession or descends according to the rule of primogeniture must be decided in each case according to the evidence given in it. (4)

1661. In the Udayarpalayam zamindari case the plaintiff sued for recovery of the zamindari on the ground of his nearness in blood. The zamindari belonged to one Z who had three wives. By the first wife he had no issue. By the second he had three sons M, R and P and by the third one son V. On the death of Z the estate passed first to M then to M's son and then to M's brother R. On the latter's death possession was taken by S the grandson of his brother P. Q. contested S's right on the ground that he was nearer in blood to R, but the Privy Council threw out his suit holding that S being a nearer co-parcener of the senior line was preferably entitled. (5) In other words, the estate was subject to lineal primogeniture. "The principle of representation places the first defendant (S) and the plaintiff (Q) in the position respectively of their grandfather (P) and father (V) and therefore equally near to the deceased zamindar (Z) (apart from any question of half-blood) and that being so, the first defendant (S) being senior in age to the plaintiff would take the impartible property in preference to the plaintiff (Q)." (1)

1662. The case would have been differently decided if it were subject to the Dayabag which does not recognize survivorship as determining the devolution of property. (2) The same view was taken by the Privy Council in a competition between a junior uncle of the last zamindar and a grandson of a senior uncle who was held to have a superior right. (3) Similarly in another case, the custom of succession by lineal primogeniture was pleaded and proved. There the contest lay between the eldest male descendant of the second son of the original owner and the descendant of his fourth son nearer by one degree to the propositus. It was not disputed that a grandson whose father was dead succeeded to the grandfather's estate in preference to a surviving uncle. But it was contended that this did not prove that the rule of lineal primogeniture applied in cases of collateral relationship. But the Privy Council held it established from a family tradition, though unsupported by any actual instance in which the rule had neither been followed or departed from proving the custom and the title of dignity bestowed on the heir apparent. (4) The rule of succession by lineal primogeniture is then an exception to the general rule that a nearer heir excludes a more remote one. But though from the reported cases it would appear that this mode of succession is common to impartible estates, it cannot be so presumed. And he who relies upon it must prove it. (5) Again, the fact that the estate is held by a single heir does not necessarily imply that it is subject to the rule of primogeniture (6) and to any particular kind of primogeniture.

1663. In determining the right of succession to an impartible estate the class of kindred from whom a single heir is to be selected, should be first ascertained. Next it should be seen whether family custom or kulachar disclosed a special rule of selection, and in default of such custom, seniority of age constitutes a title by descent to the impartible estate, by analogy to the general Hindu Law. Nearness of blood is no ground of preference under the Mitakshara Law in case of disputed succession to co-parcenary property which is partible and it is likewise no ground of preference when such property is impartible. When therefore, the family property belongs to a co-parcenary family consisting of all the brothers of the deceased propositus, whether of the whole or half-blood, in the absence of a specification to the contrary, the brother that is entitled to succeed to the property is the eldest in years. (7)

1664. The parties to a suit, first cousins once removed, contested the right to inherit an impartible zamindari, which had been acquired by their common ancestor, who had left two daughters by two different's wives. The plaintiff was the son of the younger daughter, the defendant's father was the son of the elder. The younger half-sister survived the elder, and in 1863 was judicially declared to have inherited alone the impartible zamindari. On her death, the elder daughter's son, in litigation ending in 1881 made good his title to the estate being descendant in the elder line. It was held that this last male owner became the stock from which descent had now to be traced and that the successor was no longer that stock, and that the son of this last male owner had a title to the zamindari on his father's death in consequence of the full and complete ownership of the latter who had himself become a fresh root of title.<sup>(1)</sup>

1665. In a zamindari subject to the Mitakshara a half-brother senior in age would have preference over a younger brother of full blood <sup>(2)</sup> but the very reverse is the case in a Dayabhag succession in which the doctrine of survivorship has no application either as a general part of inheritance or as an exception to it. <sup>(3)</sup> In the case of competition between two half-brothers in the absence of custom seniority in years is alone the criterion. The seniority of the mother does not count. <sup>(4)</sup> But custom may decree otherwise. It may, for instance, confer priority by reason of the seniority of the mother and not by reason of the seniority in age. Such a custom was pleaded and affirmed by the Privy Council. <sup>(5)</sup> Such was also the custom proved in a case that sons by wife of the caste of the Raja take in preference to a son by a wife of a lower caste. <sup>(6)</sup>

1666. A half-brother succeeds in preference to the widow of the last owner.<sup>(7)</sup> So where the zamindar was a Shudra amongst whom the illegitimate son succeeds to his father, it was held that as between the son by a wedded wife and illegitimate son, the ordinary rule of survivorship incidental to a family coparcenary applied and the illegitimate son having survived the legitimate upon his death without male issue, he was held entitled by survivorship to succeed to the partible Raj. <sup>(8)</sup> So if the owner die leaving no male issue, but two co-widows, they would jointly inherit if the estate is partible. But if the estate be impartible the senior will take the estate and the junior only receive maintenance. In other words the rule of descent is the personal law of the parties. That determines the heir or heirs. If the estate is partible they all participate. If it is impartible the eldest of them takes and the rest are excluded by reason of the impartible character of the estate. And since the heir is determined by the general law it follows that if females are competent to inherit to an impartible estate the fact that it is impartible is no reason for their exclusion though here as elsewhere custom may have ordained their exclusion; but in that case such custom must be strictly proved <sup>(9)</sup> in the absence of which, in the absence of male issue the widow of the late zamindar will succeed <sup>(10)</sup> and possess the absolute rights of the owner but may relinquish any of her rights in a compromise with her reversioner. (1) So it was proved that there was a custom applicable to the babuana and Sohag grants from the Darbhanga Raj which excluded widows, daughters and descendants of the daughters from succession. These grunts descend in the family of the Darbhanga Raj not to one male heir only, but to all the existing male heirs in the male line of the grantee as co-parceners. (2)

1667. Though the heir is traced in conformity with the general law, the interest of the other members of a Mitaks'hara family is, as regards an impartible estate, a mere spes successionis. (3) It is not a vested interest as in the case of partible property.

1668. Position of females.—The right of a female heir to inherit an impartible zamindari depends upon the law to which it is subject. In a zamindari subject to no special law or custom the ordinary rule must prevail, viz., a female cannot inherit an impartible ancestral estate, belonging to a joint family under the Mitaks'hara, when there are male members of the family who are qualified to succeed as heirs; a rule of law not dependent on custom, and a custom modifying the law in this respect must be a custom to admit females, not a custom to exclude them. (4) This view would be intelligible if we remember that the rights which women possess as regards an ordinary partible property cannot be enlarged by the mere fact that the property to be dealt with is impartible. They succeed or are excluded irrespective of the nature of the property in accordance with their personal law. Such law entitles them to succeed to their husband's separate property (5) from which they cannot be excluded by reason of their sex unless they are excluded by custom. (6)

1669. Dayabhag succession.—The same rule holds good in the case of a Dayabhag family, that is to say, the heir is selected by the personal law and if there are more than one equally eligible, the eldest succeeds by his right of seniority.

1670. Meaning of primogeniture.—The term primogeniture means "first-born" and the heir most senior in age whatever his relationship to the last owner, will succeed under the rule in preference to other heirs of equal degree. So where the deceased has left several sons the eldest succeeds and the fact that he was born of a junior wife is immaterial. As the Privy Council observed: "It is by the birth of his first-born son that a Hindu discharges the duty which he owes to his ancestors and obtains spiritual benefits for himself and therefore it is to that son that the pre-eminence should be given." ## CHAPTER XIV.

TRANSFER OF PROPERTY.

1671. Topical Introduction.—Hindu Law of property has been greatly modified by the encroachment of the statute law, which has however, sedulously saved it on certain points upon which it is still extant. Thus the Transfer of Property Act while it separates the Hindu Law on the subject of forms and incidents of transfer by way of sale, exchange, mortgage, lease and actionable claims expressly saves the rule of Hindu Law on the subject dealt with in Chapters II and VII relating to gifts, except 123 which prescribes the form of gifts.

It will be seen that Chapter II deals with the general principles of transfer and their construction. As most of the sections in this chapter are drawn from the Succession Act, these sections are more in request in construing gifts, grants and wills than transfers for value which are the subject of other chapters in that Act.

1672. Now it may be observed that in ascertaining meaning of any transfer regard must be had to the following four essential facts:—

(1) The nature of the property; (2) the right possessed by the transferor; (3) its purpose; and (4) the mode of alienation. Suppose for example that the property is co-parcenary interest. Here the right possessed by the transferor depends upon the personal and in fact, the local law, to which he is subject. If he is subject to the Dayabhag law then he is free to dispose of it by sale or gift at his own discretion. But if he is subject to the Mitakshara, then his right of alienation must depend upon the local view of that law, that is to say, if he is subject to the Bombay and Madras view he may transfer it for value. But if he is subject to the courts in Behar, United Provinces, Oudh and the Punjab he cannot transfer it at all; but if he contravenes the law and transfer it, the purchaser acquires an equity to his purchase which may be translated into such relief as the court deems fit. But in the last case if the transfer is involuntary, e g., if it is in execution of a decree against the co-parcener then, he is entitled to the interest to the same extent as a purchaser by treaty in Bombay and Madras.

1673. The Hindu Law of property is so far unaffected by the Transfer of Property Act. This is even less affected when it is a gift or a devise. It will be presently seen that the quintum of interest which a gift conveys to the donee depends not only upon the text of the deed but also the sex of the donee. Again both on the subject of the construction of gifts and wills, Hindu Law follows rules which are not all in consonance with the English canons of construction. The Hindu Law of transfer is thus of sufficient importance to deserve a separate chapter in the Hindu Code.

1674. The ensuing sections must, however, be necessarily regarded as merely dealing with points upon which Hindu Law remains unaffected by the statute. For a general commentary on the subject, reference is invited to the author's Law of Transfer where the rules of Hindu Law modifying or bearing on the different sections will be found set out and discussed.

Definition of property.

(2) It may be moveable or immoveable.

1675. Analogous Law.—The general notion of property will be found discussed in the author's work on the Law of Transfer. (1) It is proposed here to set out its meaning under Hindu Law, which however, contains no disquisition on the meaning of the term. "Property" is a creature of law. It includes only those things which law recognizes as capable of ownership. As such the term is necessarily elastic, comprising as it does such objects as law from time to time throws into that category.

Besides the ordinary objects and things which are classed as property by the general law, Hindu Law treats the following as property :—

1676. Idols.—An idol is treated by Hindu Law both as a juridical person and property. As property, idols may be the subject of partition. So where the plaintiff and defendant were jointly entitled by rotation to the profits from an idol in the defendant's temple, and the defendant having obstructed the plaintiff's use and worship of the idol in his temple, the plaintiff was declared entitled to remove the idol to her own house during the period that she was entitled to the profits from it. (2) So in another case it was laid down that in the eye of the law, the idols are property, and the right to deal with such property must, in the event of disputes arising, be determined by a Civil Court. (3) The idol is again a juridical person, in perpetual minority and capable of holding property through its manager. (4) As such, the individuality of one idol cannot, it is said, be validly transferred to its substitute. (5) Nor is it clothed with any existence till it is consecrated, and has so become spiritualized or rather individualized. (6) But it is submitted and is now held, that neither of these conditions is essential, since an idol is a person in an ideal sense and its personality is not destroyed by the substitution of one image for another. In fact the wooden image of the God Juggunnath has to be so renewed from time to time. A permanent image does not therefore, seem to be indispensable for dedication to a deity of which the image is merely the visible expression. (7) Such are other ideal persons such as muths (8) and colleges which lead the dual existence of being both persons and properties, since they are both owners and the things owned.

The subject will have to be further examined in the sequel in connection with the law relating to religious endowments.

1677. Sub-division of property.—Though the General Clauses Act (1) as well as the Transfer of Property Act (2) contain definitions of "immoveable property" they do not dispense with a reference to Hindu Law. The definition of that term in the Transfer of Property Act is negative and incomplete (3) and that adopted in the General Clauses Act describes it as including "land, benefits to arise out of land, and things attached to the earth, or permanently fastened to anything attached to the earth." This definition only provides a working definition of that term as used in the Imperial Acts. (4) Even as such it does not define what is a "benefit to arise out of land." Moreover, as S. 2 of the Transfer of Property Act expressly saves the rule of Hindu Law against anything enacted in Chapter II it becomes necessary to enquire what is the actual import of the term in Hindu Law. This is all the more necessary as Hindu Law prescribes special rules for the alienation of immoveable property by the manager, the Hindu widow and other qualified owners of family property.

1678. Property may be variously subdivided according to the standpoint from which it is viewed. Hindu Law divides it into land and goods, or immoveable and moveable property. So far Hindu Law does not differ from the general law. It, however, regards certain incorporeal rights as immoveable property. The leading text on the subject is as follows:—

Yajñavalkya:—Let a king having given land or assigned a corrody cause his gifts to be written for the information of good princes who will succeed him (5)

To this Jagannath adds the following explanatory note: In the Dipkalika a corrody is thus explained: the gift of a future thing by a previous agreement in this form, "I will give a hundred Suvernās (6) every month of Kartik or out of this mine, or this village, I will annually give a hundred Suvernās, or I will monthly give one Suverna." (7)

1679. Nibandh.—What is then a Nibandh, translated as corrody? It is thus explained in the Ratnakar. "That which is fixed or made fast (nibandhayte) is a Nibandh (or corrody), fixed pension receivable out of mines or the like."

The correlation of Nibandh with land shows that the two were regarded as closely allied. The question then arises what they comprise and whether they are similar in their nature and quality. There can be no doubt that there are several incorporeal rights which Hindu Law classes as immoveable property. Such is a hereditary office which it treats as immoveable property. (8) So is also a right to officiate as priest at funeral ceremonies, (9) a right to worship an idol (10) and such is a Nibandh or corrody (11) which is an allowance whether secured on land or not.<sup>(1)</sup> The question was considered by a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court in connection with the question of limitation. The government of the Peishwa had by a sanad dated 1790-1791 A. D. granted an allowance for the performance of worship in a temple at Mahim which was annually payable and paid till 1859 when the Collector of Thana discontinued it. The plaintiff sued for its recovery and the question referred to the Full Bench was whether it was immoveable property within the meaning of the Limitation Act of 1859.<sup>(2)</sup> On the construction of the sanad the grant was found to be permanent, irresumable and substantially inalienable. It was contended for the appellant that the question whether the subject matter of the suit was or was not immoveable property ought not to be determined by a reference to Hindu Law. But the court held that as the term "immoveable property" had not been defined in the Act and even if it had been, so as to connote an interest in immoveable property, its nature and quality could only be determined by Hindu Law and usage according to which a Nibandh<sup>(3)</sup> or corrody<sup>(4)</sup> signifies anything which has been promised deliverable annually or monthly or at any other fixed period. Continuing the court said: "The Hindu authorities, which we have quoted, seem to show that a pension or other periodical payment or allowance granted in permanence is Nibandh whether secured on land or not. Some of them favour the supposition that a private individual as well as a royal personage may create a Nibandh. Whether that view is sustainable is a question on which we do not intend to give any opinion, such being unnecessary, inasmuch as the present grant is from the Peishwa Government which it is admitted had full power to make it. We are unanimous in holding that the grant made by the sanad here is Nibandh and that for the reasons already given, we are bound to regard it as immoveable property or an interest in immoveable property within the scope of Act XIV of 1859, S. 1, clause 12." <sup>(5)</sup>

1680. This view was supported by a decision of the Privy Council in which the same view was taken of a Toda Gira, hag which is a customary due owing its origin to the annual payment exacted by the Girasias from the village communities in certain territories in the West of India by violence and wrong in the nature of blackmail but which on the assumption of Government by the British, acquired by long usage a quasi-legal character as customary annual payments. But inasmuch as the payments were made to Girasias who might be Mahomedans, the question of the character of hak could not be considered with reference to Hindu Law. They then added: "Whatever may have been the origin of the hak, it must be assumed to be now a right to receive an annual payment which has a legal foundation and of which the enjoyment is hereditary; and that the liability to make the payment is not personal to the respondent but one which attaches to the Inamdar virtute tenure. This being so, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the interest of the hakdar does possess the qualities both of immobility and of indefinite duration in a degree which, if the question depended on English law, would entitle it to the

1684. Spes successionis.—A mere spes successionis cannot be transferred. Such is the chance of an expectant reversionary heir

Even under the English law a mere chance of succeeding to an estate was a bare possibility incapable of assignment <sup>(1)</sup> though equity would enforce a contract to convey the estate when it fell in. <sup>(2)</sup> But the Privy Council have held "that the principle of English law which allows a subsequently acquired interest to feed, as it is said, the estoppel does not apply to Hindu conveyances."<sup>(3)</sup> It is equally clear that the same rule would hold good in cases governed by S. 6 (a) of the Transfer of Property Act, since that clause prohibits the sale of a chance directly, it equally prohibits its sale circuitously and moreover such a contract, if permitted, would defeat the law namely S. 6 (a) and would therefore be illegal within the meaning of S. 23 of the Contract Act. The result then is that such expectancies can neither be sold <sup>(4)</sup> nor their sale contracted for <sup>(5)</sup> For a fuller discussion on clause (a) See the author's Law of Transfer, 4th Ed. 1689. Analogous Law.—This is the third rule formulated in the Tagore case (6) and corresponds with S. 11 of the Transfer of Property Act and S. 125 of the Succession Act. The rule was thus stated: "If the gift were in terms of an estate inheritable according to law, with superadded words, restricting the power of transfer which the law annexes to that estate, the restriction would be rejected as being repugnant or rather as being an attempt to take away the power of transfer which the law attaches to the estate which the giver has sufficiently shown his intention to create, though he adds a qualification which the law does not recognize". (7) This rule is a necessary corollary of the general rule that no man can be permitted to create an estate unknown to the law. If a grant or devise were permitted with conditions superadded as to the mode of its enjoyment, it would subject ownership to varying incidents destroying its certainty and meaning and no one would deal with property of which the incidents may be varied and not easily ascertainable.

The Privy Council have in a series of cases held that the rule here stated is applicable to Hindus. (8) creditor of the testatrix's son. (1) In another case it was laid down that Hindu Law did not allow such a disposition of property as would have been made by a testator whose intention was to give to his descendants the profits only of his estate for their benefit, for the maintenance of religious services, but not to dispose of the estate itself. (2)

1691. Void restrictions may be ignored if they are separable. But if they are not, then the whole deed would fail. The testator executed three deeds in 1856, 1862 and 1870. In the first he prescribed the shares which his adopted son and natural sons would receive in his estate. The second apportioned his debts and the family dwelling house. The third provided that until the youngest should attain majority the names of his adult sons should not be registered nor should they be able to interfere with the property. He then added that even on attaining majority his estates shall be managed by his Amlas who will defray the expense of the worship and pay the balance to his sons. A gift over was, that on the death of a son, the surviving sons should take his share proportionately to their own, and that if any of the sons so taking should die leaving sons, such sons should receive their proportionate parts of the deceased son's share. The court held that the will contained clauses which were invalid but severable from the rest and as such it upheld the will, ignoring its subsequent provisions creating a perpetuity and the special rule of succession as regards the share of a son after he had succeeded to another deceased son. (3)

1692. Valid conditions.—The difference between valid and invalid conditions is one of degree. But they are nevertheless distinguishable. So in the second case arising out of the Tagore will, the question was whether the devisee J had not forfeited his life to estate devised to him on condition that he lived in his baithak khana. It was held that the devisee had substantially complied with the condition by keeping it open and occupying it occasionally. (4)

- (1) Rule against perpetuity in Hindu Law (1693-1695). (3) Religious and charitable gifts excepted (1697).
(2) Gift to unborn persons (1696).

1693. Analogous Law.—The rule against perpetuity is enacted in S. 14 of the Transfer of Property Act and S. 101 of the Succession Act. As these sections save any rule of Hindu Law to the contrary, it is sufficient to state that the Hindu Law equally abhors a perpetuity. It was so held by the Privy Council.

1694. The partial working of this rule will be illustrated in the following case in which the testator had provided that while his estates should remain intact, its income should be applied to the worship of the deity upon which Privy Council observed: "His object appears to have been to create a perpetuity as regards the estate, and to limit, for an indefinite period, the enjoyment of the profits of it which would not be allowed by Hindu Law." (1) The will being thus set aside as void, there was an intestacy and the natural heirs were allowed to succeed. The case would have however, been different, if the testator had first given the estate and then restrained the alienee to use only its profits in which case the gift would have taken effect without the subsequent clause creating a perpetuity. It was so held in another case also decided by the Privy Council. (2)

1696. On the same principle Hindu Law does not favour the conditional grant of property to persons yet unborn, who may happen to be the living descendants of the grantees named, at some future and indefinite period, upon the occurrence of an event, which may possibly never occur. (4) Such was the deed executed by one Rai Bind Narain in 1778 A. D. in favour of the plaintiff's ancestors in which he assigned seven villages "in the nature of a fixed remuneration. However as you are now being supported by the profits derived from three villages and by other means, for this reason four villages have not been made over to you . . . If ever in the time of my descendants you are not provided with the means of maintenance (by them) then let the descendants of yours who may be living at that time produce this deed, and taking possession of the three abovementioned villages and also of the four villages (now held) khas (by me) enjoy possession of them rent free from generation to generation . . . These seven villages will in no way appertain to my kingdom." The Privy Council held that that the condition "if you are not supported" was not shown to have been fulfilled, and if it was, that (ii) the grant was void for remoteness and uncertainty, or that (iii) it was a grant in favour of unborn and therefore equally ineffectual. "It is immaterial in what way an interest such as the appellants claim is created. If it prevents the owner from alienating his estate discharged of such future interest, before the emergence of the condition, and that event may possibly never occur, it imposes a restraint upon alienation which is contrary to the principles of Hindu Law". (5)

1697. Religion and charity excepted.—The rules against perpetuity and remoteness yield to religion and charity both under the statutory (6) as well as under the Hindu common law (7)

163. A direction to accumulate income is valid if limited to the period during which the testator is entitled to direct and control the course of devolution of property.

1698. Analogous Law.—The rule against accumulations is enacted in S. 104 of the Succession Act and S. 18 of the Transfer of Property Act. The Hindu rule is more elastic and permits of accumulations if limited to the period during which the testator is entitled to control the course of devolution of property. The history of the rule will be found set out in extension the present writer's work on the Law of Transfer <sup>(1)</sup> to which reference is invited for a fuller discussion of the Hindu rule on the subject.

The rule has no application to ancestral or joint property since such property follows a special line of devolution uncontrolled by the owner. It can apply only as regards self-acquired property. Since the testator's powers have now been enlarged by the enactment known as the Hindu Disposition of Property Act his power to accumulate has been correspondingly enlarged.

The rule stated in the section is drawn from the statement of law by Jenkins, J. (now Sir Lawrence Jenkins) <sup>(2)</sup> who said: "Now it appears to me, on principle, that if accumulations are permitted then in the absence of special provision, the limit must be that which determines the period during which the course of devolution of property can be directed or controlled by a testator." <sup>(3)</sup> In this case the testator had directed his trustees to accumulate the income until the testator's widow should adopt a son and the son should attain the sixteenth year, which was upheld as infringing no rule of law. A direction to accumulate for all time or until the accumulations aggregate three lacs or any certain amount would then be repugnant and void. <sup>(4)</sup> If a direction to accumulate up to three lacs were good, there is no reason why a similar direction to accumulate up to twenty crores before division should not also be good. But in such cases the devise fails not because the direction is per se invalid, but because it is arbitrary and repugnant to the nature of the interest created or because it created a perpetuity, or because if the direction were held valid, it might lead to divisions being made amongst persons unborn at the time of the testator's death, or because of uncertainty, it being impossible to ascertain at the testator's death who would be entitled to participate in the several divisions of accumulations directed to be made since it cannot be ascertained as to when the accumulations directed to be made, would attain the requisite amount to become divisible. It may then be impossible to say within what degree of relationship the descendants of any deceased person would be when the time for division might arise. A direction for accumulation would thus by indefinitely postponing the rights of expectant heirs, create confusion. As Norman, J. observed in a case "a testator cannot in giving his property by will impose conditions in contravention of the objects for which property exists, or contrary to the policy of the law. For instance, suppose an estate were given to a man on condition that it should be allowed to relapse into a jungle or never be cultivated, no one could doubt that such a condition would be void." <sup>(5)</sup> Consequently it has been held that a provision in a will postponing the enjoyment of the property by the son beyond the period of minority is invalid <sup>(6)</sup> and a trust to accumulate for 99 years, without any direction as to its disposition after the limitation, was similarly held void. So in another case the testator directed that his estate should remain intact, providing for religious services to be kept up by his family from the profits of the estate, his will being that "his heirs, sons, son's son's great grandsons and so on in succession should be entitled to enjoy such profits." There were clauses for the accumulations of the profits of a certain portion of the estate and forbidding alienation. It was held that the will was invalid since the testator did not intend to convey the corpus but merely its income. "His object appears to have been to create a perpetuity as regards the estate and to limit for an indefinite period the enjoyment of the profits of it, which would not be allowed by Hindu Law. It is true if the bequest had been of rents and profits and it appeared that it was the intention of the testator to pass the estate, those words would be sufficient to do it; but what their Lordships have to do is to find the intention, looking at the words of the provisions of the will; and they gather from those words that it was not his intention to pass the estate." (1)

164. The principle of election enacted in Chapter XXVII of the Succession Act, and S. 35 of the Transfer of Property Act applies to the transfers and bequest of Hindus.

Synopsis.

- (1) Principle of election applicable to Hindu Law (1699). (2) Rule of equity and justice (1699).

1699. Analogous Law.—Though the statutory rules of election do not of their own force apply to Hindus still being rules founded upon the highest principles of equity they have been held to be equally applicable to them. (2) So where a Hindu widow devised the estate which she had inherited from her husband to A and a legacy to B both being the heirs of her husband, B sued for the legacy under the will and for half the immoveable property as her husband's heir, it was held that he should be put to his election whether to take the legacy under the will or half the property as heir of the testator's husband. (3) A person who by his act or conduct elects to take under a will is precluded from maintaining a suit on the basis of a claim in opposition to the will. So where the testator bequeathed an estate as his self-acquired property the legatee obtained probate of the will and possession of the property devised to him. He then sued for recovery of the estate on the ground the property was ancestral but the court threw out his suit on the ground that having by his conduct elected to take under the will the plaintiff could not turn round and set up a claim in opposition to the will. (4) The legatee electing to accept a sum of money bequeathed to him in repayment of a debt, cannot claim the same amount once again as a legacy. (5) Having however failed to obtain it as a debt, he is not precluded from afterwards claiming it as a legacy. (6)

Transfer or devise of self-acquired property.

165. A person may transfer or devise his self-acquired property.

1700. Analogous Law.—The rule here stated now appears to be a truism; and so it is. But it has emerged out of Hindu Law after a prolonged struggle, in which the texts tied the acquirer down to the rule that whatever he acquired was the property of the family to which he belonged. But natural justice has at last triumphed over the written text and it is now established that a Hindu is free to transfer or devise his self-acquired property, whether moveable or immoveable.

Power of the manager, trustee guardian shebait, female heir to transfer.

166. (1) The manager, trustee, guardian, and the shebait are all entitled to transfer the property entrusted to their management for the sake of necessity or benefit of the estate or of the family members or the ward or the trust as the case may be.

(2) The father of a joint family may transfer its property for the same purpose or for the satisfaction of his own antecedent debts.

(3) The widow, and other female heirs possess similar powers of alienation for legal necessity or benefit of the estate.

| (3) Powers of manager, trustee, guardian, etc., to alienate property (1701). | (5) Alienation by female limited owner (1701).       |

1701. Analogous Law.—That the manager, the trustee, the guardian of a minor and the head of a religious endowment all possess similar powers of alienation is now settled by the Privy Council. (1) The father wields these powers in his capacity of manager, in addition to which by reason of his relationship and apart from his position as manager, he possesses the textual right of alienating the joint property of himself and of his sons in satisfaction of his own antecedent debts. This is explained by the Privy Council who said: "The law of the Mitakshara has, however given to the father in his capacity of manager and head of the family, certain powers with reference to the joint family property. The general principle in regard to that matter is that he is at liberty to effect or to dispose of the joint property in respect of purposes denominated necessary purposes. The principle in regard to this is analogous to that of the power vested in the head of a religious endowment or muth or of the guardian of an infant family. In all of the cases where it can be established that the estate itself that is under administration demanded or the family interests justified the expenditure, then those entitled to the estate are bound by transaction. It is not accurate to describe this as either inconsistent with or an exception to the fundamental rule of Mitakshara. For where estate or family necessity exists, that necessity rests upon the co-parceners as a whole and it is proper to imply a consent of all of them to that act of the one which such necessity has demanded." (1)

Their Lordships went on to add that in addition to these powers the father possessed the exceptional power of alienating the family property for his own antecedent debts not shown to be illegal or immoral. (2)

Their Lordships were dealing with the case of the father and not of the widow who however possesses no greater power than the guardian or manager added to which she is under a further legal obligation to discharge her husband's debts for which she is entitled to alienate her inherited estate. (3)

CHAPTER XV.

TRUSTS AND BENAMI TRANSACTIONS.

Form of trust.

167. (1) No form is necessary to create a trust for religious or charitable purposes.

(2) But a secular trust cannot be created otherwise than as provided in Ss. 5 and 6 of the Trusts Act.

Synopsis.

- |   |   |

| (1) Public trust, how created(1702). | (3) private trust (1702).                                    |
| (2) Formalities for creation of a        | (3) Imperfect gifts not to be converted into a trust (1703). |

1702. Analogous Law.—Even under English law “technical language is not necessary to create a trust. It is enough that the intention is apparent. Thus it has been long settled that words of recommendation, request, entreaty, wish, or expectation, addressed to a devisee or legatee, will make him trustee for the person or persons in whose favour such expressions are used, provided the testator has pointed out, with sufficient clearness and certainty, both the subject matter and the object or objects of the intended trust.” (1) Where therefore the testator by his will left to his wife the whole of his property in the confidence that she would act justly to their children in dividing the same when no longer required by her, the wife by her will left to their children certain portions of such property leaving off, amongst other things, certain banking shares. These were seized by her creditors but the court released them holding that the wife took under her husband’s will a life-interest only in his property with a power of appointment in favour of the children and that the shares belonged to the child and could not be sold in execution of the decree as part of the estate of the wife. (2)

A trust is created when the author of the trust indicates with reasonable certainty by any words or acts, (a) an intention on his part to create thereby a trust, (b) the purpose of the trust, (c) the beneficiary, (d) the trust property, and (e) the transfer of such property to the trustee, unless the trust is declared by will or the author of the trust is himself to be the trustee.

Reading Ss. 5 and 6 of the Trusts Act together it would seem that a specific oral declaration of trust on points (a) to (d) would be enough to create a trust without transfer where the author was himself the trustee. (3)

1703. Imperfect gift.—Where there has been a clear intention to make a gift but on account of some omission on the donor’s part, that intention has failed, the courts will not erect a trust on the imperfect gift. When the intention is to make a gift, and the intention has failed for want of transfer or any other cause, the court will not convert what was meant to be an out and out gift into a trust. (1) No trust is created by words in the will to the effect that "the executors should give my brothers, their wives and children according to their (executors') wishes." (2) A person cannot do by intervention of a trustee what he cannot do directly by a gift. (3)

Trusts valid and void.

168. A trust may be created for any lawful purpose, whether secular or religious.

Synopsis.

- (1) Trust valid only if object lawful (1704). (2) Applicability of English law (1705).

1704. Analogous Law.—Secular trusts are now subject to the Trusts Act (4) which however, exempts religious trusts from its operation. (5) Such trusts will be governed by Hindu Law which recognizes the creation of trusts as was stated in the Tagore case: "Property whether moveable or immovable must for many purposes be vested more or less absolutely in some person or persons for the benefit of other persons, and trusts of various kinds have been recognized and acted on in India in many cases. Implied trusts were recognized and established here in the case of benami purchases (6). . . and in cases of a provision for charity or for other beneficial objects, such as the professorship (7) provided for by the will under consideration, where no estate is conferred on the beneficiaries and their interest is in the proceeds of the property (to which no objection has been raised), the creation of a trust is practically necessary." (8)

1705. Quoting this, West, J., added in a case: "But while the substantive Hindu Law insists as strongly as any on the suppression of fraud and the fulfilment of promises, it fails to furnish the detailed rules by which effect is given to its principles in cases of trust. It contemplates no such power and flexibility in the legal machinery as are an integral element of the English equity system. If the court is called on to give effect to a trust in any given case, it looks indeed to the Hindu Law of property to determine the estate of the trustee; but in many of the duties it annexes to the estate, the rights it recognizes as arising from the position of beneficiaries, the means by which those rights are made effectual, it is governed by the rules of English equity. There are no others that it can apply. It has to take care, in applying them, not to violate the "laws, manners and customs and usages" of the native community as these may subsist. It must not allow a trust to be made a means of conferring a gift either inter vivos or by testamentary disposition upon a person not in existence at the moment when the donation is declared. It must not allow it to effect a course of devolution opposed to the Hindu

Law of property and succession. Thus the operation of the native laws is preserved as to the estates that may be taken in property and the purposes to which they may be applied, while it gains a flexible adaptation to new circumstances from the English system. In meeting an exigency or taking cognizance of a form of right not provided for in the shastras the court, in exercising its jurisdiction under S. 41 of the charter, may certainly apply the Hindu Law. It must be careful not to overlook it, but taking the Hindu law as one of its data, it applies 'English law' also in the form of equity to all or nearly all the questions that arise." (1) These observations were made in a case in which the petitioner had in 1863 dedicated certain lands and a large sum of money to be applied to religious and charitable uses, vesting the same in trustees, one of whom had since died. The petitioner applied to fill his place, and the defence was that the surviving trustee was competent to administer the trust; but the court held that as the trust deed provided for the appointment of two trustees, they should be appointed. (2)

1706. The enactment of the Trusts Act, has placed all secular trusts under statutory control leaving only "public, private, religious or charitable endowments" as still amenable to the personal law of the parties.

1707. It is clear that since Hindu Law permits the dedication of property to religious and charitable uses it must necessarily permit the vesting of it in trustees but for whose intervention the purpose of the founder would be impossible of achievement. But the trusts can only be sustained to the extent and for the purpose of giving effect to those beneficiary interests which the law recognizes, and that, for the determination of those interests the beneficial interest in the residue of the property remains in the person, who, but for the will, would lawfully be entitled thereto. (3)

1708. The subject of religious and charitable endowments occupies an important place in Hindu Law and will be the subject of another chapter.

Benami transfer.

169. (1) A person does not acquire any interest in property by merely lending his name to another.

(2) Where one person holds property for another, he will be deemed to hold it in trust for another.

Synopsis.

(1) Benami transfers common in India (1709). (2) Nature of benami transactions (1710).

1709 Analogous Law.—The habit of acquiring and holding property benami so inveterate in India, is not merely confined to the Hindus; (4), nor indeed, is the habit confined to India, since the purchase of property by one in the name of another is not unknown in England, (5) though such instances are comparatively rare. But in India it is a habit which, though now on the decline, is yet maintaining a firm hold on the people.

1710. The case for benami may arise (i) where the father or manager acquires property in the name of the junior member for the benefit of the family; (ii) where the husband acquires property in the name of the wife; (iii) where similar acquisitions are made by strangers. Not only may property be acquired benami but it may be transferred and held benami. But the principle applicable to all cases is the same. As the Privy Council observed, 'benami transactions are common amongst Hindus; but I am not aware that there is any authority for applying to them the doctrine of resulting trust as a presumption of law. On the other hand the presumption of advancement does not necessarily arise upon a purchase by a father in the name of his son. There seems then to be nothing in the Hindu Law which is contrary to either the plaintiff's or the defendant's view of this case. And the court must determine the case upon its own conviction deduced from the evidence of what the intention of Rajaram Gosai in this particular transaction was. We ought not however, in dealing with this question entirely to leave out of consideration the decisions of the English courts, because, although the presumptions which I have mentioned are not to be applied as legal presumptions, the process of reasoning on which they are founded so far as it rests on experience or observation of the ordinary principle of human action, and is not repugnant to any of the peculiarities of Hindu faith or custom may most legitimately and usefully be applied to the construction of ambiguous acts, and to the deduction of a particular intention from them; and further, because in determining what is and what is not admissible to prove intention, we must in this, as in every other case, follow the English law of evidence.' (1)

Proof of benami.

170. (1) There is no presumption in favour of benami and he who alleges that the apparent title is not the real title must allege and prove it.

(2) There is no presumption that a purchase made in the name of the child, wife or mistress is benami or by way of advancement, the question being one of intention which must be proved by the party asserting it.

1711. Analogous Law.—The first clause is in accordance with the general law but the second clause states a rule at variance with the English law, under which a purchase made in favour of the wife or child is treated as made by way of advancement in their favour though the relationship is a circumstance which should be taken into consideration. (2) In one case it was contended that where a property is purchased apparently by a wife and where neither party has given evidence to show who paid the purchase money, there was a presumption that the purchase was made by the husband in the name of the wife. But the court held that there was no room for any presumption. (1) The case of a joint family is, however, different, since the presumption of jointness raises a presumption that the son has no funds of his own and any purchase made by the father is consequently presumed to be benami; (2) but otherwise there is no presumption in favour of benami. (3) A presumption in favour of benami may however, be raised by very little evidence. The points upon which a question of benami turns are:—

(1)—Who advanced the consideration (4); (2)—who had possession of the property; and (3)—of the document of title; (4)—was there any motive for the benami; and (5)—was the alleged benamidar so connected, as he is likely to have acted as a benamidar. (6) For example if the apparent purchase was by the wife but the husband continued to be in possession of the property there would be a presumption that the sale by the husband to the wife was merely benami. (6) So the presumption in favour of benami would be strengthened by proof of the payment of consideration. (7) In fact this is the real (8) though not the sole test. (9) There is no presumption that a purchase made by a person in the name of his mistress is made for her benefit; (10) though where such property was registered in the name of the woman who was therefore, the only person legally entitled to collect the rents, the facts that the person advancing the money possessed a number of other properties none of which was put in the name of the woman, that the value of the property in the woman's name was very small, and that the woman's right to the property was not disputed until some six years after the man's death, were held to be circumstances sufficient to show that the title passed to the woman. (11) So where a person brought a daughter of his wife's relative as his own child, treated her with affection and married her to his cousin at considerable expense, kept her husband as his Khana-Dumad (son-in-law to reside in the house) and purchased a valuable garden and a house in her name with his own money and treated that property as belonging to her up to the time of her death, it was held that the purchase was really for the benefit of the adopted daughter and not merely benami, and that the transaction was in effect a marriage settlement by way of gift of the money for which the property was purchased. (12)

1712. Benami not presumed.—There is no presumption in favour of benami. The presumption is rather the other way although the habit of benami is prevalent in India. (13)

1713. The courts even look with jealousy on benami transactions, requiring from one claiming under such title, a strict proof, <sup>(1)</sup> though in view of its prevalence, even a slight quantity of evidence to show that it was a sham transaction will suffice for the purpose. <sup>(2)</sup> But though slight, it must be evidence and not mere suspicion. As Lord Westbury said: "Undoubtedly there are in the evidence circumstances which may create suspicion and doubt may be entertained with regard to the truth of the case made by the appellants, but in matters of this description it is essential to, take care that decision of the court rests not upon suspicion, but upon legal testimony." <sup>(3)</sup> Quoting this dictum in a later case Lord Shaw said: "In regard to benami transactions courts of law should not approach them with that scrupulous rigour which in other systems of jurisprudence may demand the existence of the clearest positive evidence that the ex facie owner of a property is a transferee for or holds the same for the interest of another. Benami transactions are very familiar in Indian practice, and as Lord Hobhouse said in Uman Parshad v Gandharp Singh, <sup>(4)</sup> even a slight quantity of evidence to show that it was a sham transaction will suffice for the purpose." The learned Judge however, added: "Still, such a transfer cannot be considered as nothing. The person who impugns its apparent character must show something or other to establish that it is a benami or sham transaction. This brings the legal situation into line with the general doctrine already cited from Lord Westbury." <sup>(5)</sup> The case in which these observations occur was decided upon the following facts: One Wilayat had mortgaged some of his villages to one Durga Prasad who brought them to sale in execution. They were purchased by Wilayat's wife for Rs. 10,000 who entered upon possession retaining it for 10 years after which she devised them to one M with the consent of her husband and her nephews. The mortgagee having in the meantime obtained a supplementary decree under S. 90 of the Transfer of Property Act attached the self same villages as belonging to his mortgagor Wilayat for whom he alleged his wife had purchased them benami. The Privy Council held that though a little evidence was sufficient to prove a benami that little must be evidence and not mere suspicion and that there was nothing in the case before them to take the case out of the rule that an apparent title was prima facie the real title unless the contrary was established.

This may be established by showing that the person purchasing the property had no means of his own, and that the consideration was advanced by the beneficiary who had possession and control over the property. <sup>(6)</sup>

1714. Badges of benami.—The first and most material criterion of beneficial ownership is the source from which the purchase money is derived. <sup>(7)</sup> This does not mean the apparent passing of consideration—money from hand to hand which is not sufficient to establish the bona fide character of a sale. It is necessary to see that it is actually the money of the alleged vendee that is really paid to the vendor. <sup>(8)</sup>

1715. Evidence of benami.—Oral evidence is admissible to prove that a transaction was benami <sup>(9)</sup> except in cases where the transaction was entered into with intent to defraud a third party in which case if the fraudulent purpose was accomplished, then the court applies the maxim in pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis. (1) Another exception favours the certified auction purchaser whose purchase cannot be shown to be benami. (2) But these are all exceptional cases and where there is no legal impediment to the proof of benami it may be proved by oral evidence. And where the oral evidence is inconclusive it is necessary to rely largely upon the surrounding circumstances, the position of the parties and their relation to one another, the motives which could govern their action, and their subsequent conduct. (3)

1716. As benami implies repose of confidence between the benamidar and the beneficiary, the existence of relationship between

(2) Relationship the two is a circumstance which has a material bearing on the case. Such is a purchase made in the name of the wife or the daughter (4) or other near relations. (5)

1717. Father and son.—It has however, been laid down in several cases that a purchase of property by the father in the name of the son is presumed to be benami and on the father's death becomes the property of the family. (6) Such presumption would be strengthened if the son was a minor.

As between the vendor and vendee, where the latter produces the deed and the former proves his possession, the burden is still on him to show that the sale-deed was only executed benami and that he had not received the consideration though he acknowledged it in his sale-deed. (7)

CHAPTER XVI.

GIFTS AND GRANTS.

1718. Topical Introduction.—The Hindu Law of gifts has been modified by S. 123 of the Transfer of Property Act, Chapter VII (Ss. 122-129) of which generally relates to gifts of both moveable and immoveable property. S. 129 however, saves gifts of moveable property made in contemplation of death, and the chapter generally saves any rule of Hindu Law except as provided by S. 123, the effect of which is that whatever may be the rule of Hindu Law, a gift must be made as therein provided. As this section prescribes the form in which a gift must be completed, the only points upon which the rule of Hindu Law is saved are those which affect the personal law of the donor and the donee, its construction and necessary incidents. These have all been described with some particularity in the author's Law of Transfer to which reference is invited for a fuller discussion on the topics here summarized.

Who may make a gift.

171. Any adult may make a gift of his property or any interest therein over which he possesses the power of disposal.

(2) Texts on the subject (1719-1723). (4) Father's power of gift (1725).

1719. Analogous Law.—The sacerdotal law gives naturally commend-Historical retro- ed the making of gifts to the Brahmins as the high road
spect. to heaven. But as a curb upon his cupidity, Manu declared that "though permitted to receive presents, let him avoid a habit of taking them, since by taking many gifts his divine light soon fades." (2) But all the same the donor was encouraged to make continual gifts.

Manu :—223. Let each wealthy man continually and sedulously perform sacred rites, and consecrate pools of gardens with faith: since those two acts, accomplished with faith and with riches honestly gained, procure an imperishable reward.

227. If he meet with fit objects of benevolence let him constantly bestow gifts on them both at sacrifices and consecrations to the best of his power and with a cheerful heart.

228. Such a gift how small so ever bestowed on request without grudging passes to a worldly object which will secure the giver from all evil.

284. And for whatever purpose a man bestows any gift, for a similar purpose he shall receive with due honour a similar reward.

(2) Manu IV-186.

285. But he who respectfully bestows a present and he who respectfully accepts it, shall go to a seat of bliss, but if they act otherwise, to a region of horror. (1)

1720. Yajnavalkya's dissertation on gifts is contained in the Achar Kand and proceeds on the lines of Manu.<sup>2</sup> It has no legal value. The Mitakshara<sup>(3)</sup> and other texts follow the same line. All regard gift as a pious act and therefore relegate it to the Achar Kand of their works.

1721. Hindu Law divides gifts into four classes: (1) Deya or that which should be given; (2) Adeyam or that which should not be given; (3) Dattam or valid gifts; and (4) Adattam or invalid gifts. As to the quantum of interest, Hindu Law divides gifts as stated by Wilson, J. "Gifts are of three kinds—those which convey a present title and interest and a present right of enjoyment; those which are vested, that is present in interest, but in which the enjoyment is deferred; and those which are contingent, that is to say, in which neither title nor right of enjoyment is given at present; both depend upon future uncertain events. All these kinds of gifts are admissible among Hindus. All are recognized by the Succession Act, the Hindu Wills Act and the Transfer of Property Act." (4)

1722. As to Deya or what may be given, Narad allows that "what is left of the property after the expense of maintaining the family has been defrayed, may be given. But by giving away anything besides, a householder will incur censure." (5) He then describes the valid and invalid gifts as follows: "The price paid for merchandise, wages, (a present offered) for an amusement, (a gift made) from affection, or from gratitude or for sexual intercourse with a woman, and a respectful gift are the seven kinds of valid gifts." "Invalid gifts are the following: (1) what has been given by a man under the influence of fear, or (2) anger, hatred or (3) sorrow or (4) pain, or (5) as a bribe, or (6) in jest, or fraudulently (7) under false pretences (8) or by a child; or (9) by a fool, (10) by a person not his own master; or (11) by one distressed; or (12) by one intoxicated or (13) by one insane; or (14) in consideration of a reward thinking this man will show me some service, and so on, is invalid; (15) what was given from ignorance to unworthy man thought to be worthy or (16) for a purpose thought to be virtuous through ignorance. (6) The result of making and taking invalid gifts is penal: "Both the donee who covets invalid gifts and accepts them through avarice, and the donor of what ought not to be given who yet gives it away, deserve punishment." (7)

1723. This classification of void gifts differs from that of Manu who regards only the following gift as void: "Should money or goods be given or promised as a gift by one man to another, who asks it for some religious act, the gift shall be void, if that act be not afterwards performed" (6)

It is clear that neither this conception nor this classification of gifts is in accordance with the modern notions of jurisprudence, and though the rules of Hindu Law on gifts remains directly unaffected by the Transfer of Property Act, their interpretation in the light of modern notions of equity and justice has altered the original rules beyond all recognition.

1725. The authority to make a gift depends upon the donor's power of disposal over the subject matter of gift. If it is his self-acquired property he is entitled to dispose it of by gift or devise at his discretion. But if it is his joint property, then his power of disposal is necessarily limited by the rights of his coparceners.

Again, his power of disposal may depend upon the nature of the property. If it is impartible, he cannot alienate it in parts; if inalienable, he cannot alien it at all. Then again the quantum of interest taken by the donee may depend upon the terms of the gift and the sex of the donee. These will be the subject of a future discussion.

The subject of gift of co-parcenary interest has already been the subject of discussion in the foregoing pages (Ss. 107, 109).

The subject of individual property and the extent to which it may be disposed of by gift will now be considered.

1725. Father's power of gift.—As regards the father's power of gift it is settled that under the Dayabhag law, the father being the sole and undivided owner of all property whether moveable or immoveable, ancestral or self-acquired, he can make a valid gift or devise of any such property. (1)

But the powers of the Mitakshara father are limited, for the Mitakshara declares that the father has independent power in the disposal of effects other than immoveable for indispensable acts of duty and for purposes prescribed by texts of law, as gifts through affection, support of the family, relief from distress and so forth, but he is subject to the control of his sons and the rest in regard to the immoveable estate, whether acquired by himself or inherited from his father or other predecessor. (2) But as pointed out by the Privy Council, this text can no longer be literally enforced. (3) The question then arises, what are the limits within which the father is entitled to make a gift of his joint or separate property. It cannot be denied that the true measure of his power is to be found in the cases and not in the texts. His present power has been the result of gradual growth. At first the text was literally construed so far as to protect the sons. And the Privy Council accordingly laid down that if the father had no male issue, he was free to dispose of all his self-acquired property whether moveable or immoveable. (4) But later on it was discovered that the Mitakshara texts were themselves contradictory: for while in one place the father's wealth is declared to be "subject to the control of the sons" (5) in another place, it is said that the "sons must acquiesce in the father's disposal of his own self-acquired property." (6)

able.<sup>(1)</sup> In so holding, their Lordships said: "It appears to them that the subject is one of those in which from the earliest times there have been two conflicting principles of law, one favouring the paternal integrity and the fixed succession of family property, and the other the free use of such property for the circumstances of the day. The controversies and conflicting decisions on the father's powers of mortgage and sale, for the payment of his debts out of the inheritance, and on the testamentary power, will occur to everybody who is familiar with Indian litigations of the past half century or so. On each of those subjects there has been a growing tendency, coincident with the growth of commerce, to give more effect to the latter of the two principles, viz., the use of property by the living generation, or its living heads."<sup>(2)</sup> They then held that the father had full power of disposal of all his self-acquired property whether by sale, mortgage, gift or devise and that the presence of the sons was no curb on his power.

1727. Analogous Law.—The Hindu Law of gifts is unaffected by the provisions of Chapter VII relating to gifts in the Transfer of Property Act, S. 129 of which enacts as follows:—

Nothing in this chapter relates to gifts of moveable property made in contemplation of death, or shall be deemed to affect any rule of Mahomedan law, or save as provided by S. 123, a rule of Hindu or Buddhist law.

1728. The effect of this clause on Hindu Law is that if there be any rule of Hindu Law inconsistent with the statutory rules enacted in Chapter VII then latter the would give way to the former. But there must be such a rule. If there is none the statutory rules will apply. But so far as regards S. 123, it applies overruling Hindu Law under which the one thing necessary was delivery of possession to the donee,<sup>(3)</sup> writing being unnecessary and optional.<sup>(4)</sup> Now that the rule of Hindu Law has been abrogated by S. 123 of the Transfer of Property Act a question has been raised whether the abrogation is both as regards writing and possession, or only as regards writing the necessity of which is insisted on in the statute, or to put it differently, if a gift complies with the requirements of S. 123, is it a good gift though there has been no delivery of possession in accordance with the requirements of Hindu Law.

1729. All the High Courts have now settled down to this view <sup>(1)</sup> though the necessity of possession is yet at times insisted on. <sup>(2)</sup> It should however be noted that the rule as to writing is a negative rule and deduced from the absence of any provision as to writing as being essential to complete a gift to be found in Hindu Law which merely insists upon the delivery of possession as the indispensable necessity to complete the gift. This is the sole and single rule which S. 123 has abrogated. Its effect is to reverse the law as it was understood prior to its enactment in 1882 when a registered deed could complete no gift unless it was accompanied by the transfer of possession. Under the present law transfer of possession cannot effectuate a gift unless it is evidenced by a registered deed.

1730. This section merely deals with the rule of interpretation of a gift or devise made in favour of a class. What is then a class? The term is thus explained by Jarman. "A number of persons are popularly said to form a class when they can be designated by some general name as 'children' 'grandchildren' 'nephews', but in legal language, the question whether a gift is one to a class depends not upon those considerations, but upon the mode of the gift itself, namely, that it is a gift of an aggregate sum to a body of persons uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time and who are all to take in equal or some other definite proportions, the share of each being dependent for its amount upon the ultimate number of persons." <sup>(3)</sup>

1731. The term "class" as used in this section and in Hindu Law is not used in the technical sense ascribed to it in English law. It is used in the popular sense as designating a body of persons who can be generally described as possessing the same attribute—such as sons, brothers, nephews and the like. <sup>(4)</sup>

173 Subject to the provisions of Ss. 13, 14 and 20 of the Transfer in favour of unborn person. the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, a settlement, gift, or devise may be made in favour of a person not in existence at the date of the gift.

(5) Act XV of 1916.

Hindu Law of devise which did not allow a gift or devise to be made in favour of a person <sup>(1)</sup> real or juridical, e.g., an idol <sup>(2)</sup> not in existence at the time it took effect. Now since under Hindu Law, an estate cannot remain in abeyance but must vest in some one at the time of the donor's or testator's death, it followed that where the donee or the devisee was not in existence at the time of the former's death his disposition failed altogether. <sup>(3)</sup> But English law permitted, however, the creation of such future estates, subject to the limitations contained in Ss. 13, 14 and 20. With the passing of the Hindu Disposition of Property Act, it is not possible to extend the same rule to Hindus.

Though the operation of this section will best be seen in the subsequent discussion on the effect of future devises, it is not to be understood as confined merely to gifts and devises but applies equally even to transfers for consideration. <sup>(4)</sup>

1733. The net result of the Hindu Disposition of Property Act is to allow of the creation of future estates subject to the provisions of Ss. 13, 14 and 20 of the Transfer of Property Act.

This Act has overruled a series of cases decided by the Privy Council and the courts in India in which the orthodox Hindu rule was enunciated and applied. <sup>(5)</sup>

The leading Privy Council case was decided upon the construction of the will of the late Prasanna Kumar Tagore who died on the 30th August 1868 leaving his only son, the plaintiff, and two widowed daughters with six of their children him surviving. On the 10th October 1862 the deceased had executed a will which cut out the plaintiff with a statement that he had been already provided for in the testator's life-time, the real cause being his conversion to Christianity in 1851. The will purported to give all the testator's properties to four trustees of whom one Jatindra Mohan Tagore (hereafter to be called, J.) was one, who were to convert all personalty into cash and to apply the profits of the realty in payment of debts, legacies and annuities and the founding of the Tagore law professorship after which the realty was to be held by the trustees for the use of the said J. for life, and on J.'s death to the eldest son of J. who should be born during the testator's life, for the life of such eldest son, "and after the determination of that estate to the use of the first and other sons successively of the eldest son of J. according to their respective seniorities and the heirs male of their respective bodies issuing successively; and upon the failure or determination of that estate, to the use of the second and other sons of J. who shall be born during the testator's life" successively; according to their respective seniorities for the life of each such son respectively; and upon the failure or determination of that estate to the use of the first and other sons successively of such second or other sons of J. and the heirs male of their respective bodies issuing, so that the eldest sons of

J. born in the testator's life-time and his first and other sons successively, and the heirs male of their respective bodies issuing, may be preferred to and take before the younger of the sons of the said J. born in the testator's life-time and his and their respective first and other sons successively, and the heirs male of their respective bodies issuing and after the failure or determination of the uses and estates herein before limited, to the use of each of the sons of the said J. who shall be born after the testator's death successively according to their respective seniorities, and the heirs male of their respective bodies issuing so that that the elder of such sons and the heirs take before the younger of such sons and the heirs male of their and his respective bodies issuing and after the failure or determination of the uses and estates herein-before limited, then to the use of S the second son of the testator's brother after the failure or determination of that estate, then to the sons of S and their sons and the heirs male of their body respectively; in like manner for J.'s and after the failure or determination of the said several estates and uses to the first and other sons and their sons and the heirs male of their bodies of L successively and respectively in like manner as in the case of the sons of J and S.

The will then contained a provision that adopted sons shall be deemed to be sons of the body within the will, and be postponed to the actual issue of the body.

It next provided that the estates of inheritance shall not be alienable.

The plaintiff sued for cancellation of his father's will as carving out estates inconsistent with Hindu Law.

Phear, J. dismissed the suit as disclosing no cause of action but the decree was reversed on appeal by Sir Barnes Peacock, C. J. and Norman, J. who held portions of the will void. Both sides appealed to the Privy Council whose judgment was delivered by Willes, J. who laid down the following rules:—

(1) A grant or bequest prima facie conveys the entire interest of the grantor unless it is limited by words clearly expressed or necessarily implied.

(2) All estates of inheritance created by gift or will, so far as they are inconsistent with the general law of inheritance are void, as such. (1)

(3) Where an absolute estate is given by the gift or will, a condition repugnant to the grant or restricting its mode of enjoyment, is void.

(4) A person capable of taking under a will must be such a person as could take a gift inter vivos; and therefore, must either in fact or contemplation of law, be in existence at the death of the testator. (-)

They then examined the will and while upholding the life-interest of J. as valid under Hindu Law, held the subsequent estates of inheritance created by the will as invalid. (3)

All these propositions will now be explained.

1734. Analogous Law.—Clause 2 of this section is drawn from S. 17 of the Transfer of Property Act for which there is no analogous provision in the Succession Act, the corresponding S. 105 of which is restrictive and drawn on the lines of the English Mortmain Acts.

The Hindu rule and that followed by the Transfer of Property Act allows a gift or bequest in favour of religion and charity without any of the restrictions contained in Ss. 14-16. In other words, the law enacted in the Transfer of Property Act and favoured by Hindu Law is on the lines of English law as it existed before the passing of statute of Mortmain. (8)

1735. Religious and charitable endowments excepted.—There is abundant authority in favour of religious and charitable gifts.

1736. The law on the subject of settlement, gift or devise is now subject to the Hindu Disposition of Property Act, 1916, <sup>(5)</sup>

Historical retrospect. altering the pre-existing law which stood as follows:

Under Hindu Law as interpreted till then, the view was that no gift or devise could be made to a non-existent person, that is to say a gift made to a person who was not alive either in fact or in the womb, was void; so was a devise made to one who was not similarly in existence at the death of the testator. So it is said in the Dayabhag "that in the case of donation, the donees' right to the thing arises from the act of the giver, namely from his relinquishment in favour of the donee who is a sentient person." <sup>(6)</sup> Referring to this text the Privy Council said that "by a rule now generally adopted in jurisprudence, this class would include children in embryo who afterwards come into separate existence. <sup>(7)</sup> As to the case of adopted children (so much relied upon during the argument) it is distinguishable, because of the peculiar law applicable to that relation. The Hindu Law recognizes an adopted child, whether adopted by the father himself in his life-time, or by the person to whom he has given the power of adoption after his death, from amongst those of his class, of one to stand in the place of a child actually begotten by the father who adopts him, or for or on behalf of whom he is adopted. Such child may be provided for as a person whom the law recognizes as in existence at the death of the testator, or to whom by way of exception, not by way of rule, it gives the capacity of inheriting or otherwise taking from the testator, as if he had existed at the time of the testator's death having been actually begotten by him. Apart from this exceptional case, which serves to prove the rule, the law is plain that the donee must be a person in existence capable of taking at the time when the gift takes effect" <sup>(8)</sup>.

1737. This settled the law as regards gifts and it equally settled it as regards wills which follow the analogy of gifts. After pointing this out, their Lordships concluded, "that a person capable of taking under a will must be such a person as could take a gift inter vivos and therefore must either in fact or in contemplation of law, be in existence at the death of the testator". <sup>(9)</sup> These principles were of course applied in several cases by the Indian courts. <sup>(10)</sup> But meanwhile in 1882 the Transfer of Property Act was enacted and it saved these rules by a saving clause inserted in S. 2. The Act however enacted the English law which permitted of dispositions to unborn persons within the limits prescribed in Ss. 13, 14 and 20. The undue restrictions of the Hindu rule were first broken in upon by the enactment of the Hindu Transfers and Bequests Act, 1914, <sup>(1)</sup> which applies to such dispositions whenever made as are intended to come into operation after the commencement of the Act. <sup>(2)</sup> It legalizes bequests to unborn persons subject to the restriction contained in S. 14 of the Transfer of Property Act and S. 101 of the Succession Act which is S. 3 of the Madras Act. Two years later, the Imperial Council was moved to enlarge the scope of this Act by enacting the Hindu Disposition of Property Act which in the first instance extends to whole of British India except the province of Madras "provided that the Governor General may by notification in the Gazette of India extend this Act to the Province of Madras." <sup>(3)</sup> This important Act unlike the Madras Act not only deals with devises but also with all dispositions by way of transfers, settlements and gifts, but the object of the two is identical.

1738. The provisions of this Act run as follows :—

THE HINDU DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY ACT.

ACT NO. XV OF 1916.

Received the assent of the Governor General on the 28th September 1916, An Act to remove certain existing disabilities in respect of the power of disposition of property by Hindus for the benefit of persons not in existence at the date of such disposition.

WHEREAS, it is expedient to remove certain existing disabilities in respect of the power of disposition of property by Hindus for the benefit of persons not in existence at the date of such disposition.

It is hereby enacted as follows :—

Short title and extent. 1. (1) This Act may be called the Hindu Disposition of Property Act, 1916.

(2) It extends, in the first instance, to the whole of British India, except the province of Madras: Provided that the Governor-General in Council may by notification in the Gazette of India, extend this Act to the Province of Madras.

2. Subject to the limitations and provisions specified in this Act no Dispositions for the benefit of persons not in existence disposition of property by a Hindu whether by transfer inter vivos or by will, shall be invalid by reason only that any person for whose benefit it may have been made was not in existence at the date of such disposition.

3. The limitations and provisions referred to in S. 2 shall not be the Limitations and conditions. following, namely: (a) in respect of dispositions by transfer inter vivos, those contained in Ss. 13, 14 and 20 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, and

(3) S. 1 (2) Act XV of 1916.

(2) Mad. Act 1 of 1914 which came into

(b) in respect of dispositions by will, those contained in Ss. 100 and 101 of the Indian Succession Act, 1862.

4. Where a disposition of property fails by reason of any of the limitations referred to in S. 3, any disposition intended to take effect after or upon failure of such prior disposition also fails.

5. Where the Governor-General in Council is of opinion that the Khoja community in British India or any part thereof desire that the provisions of this Act should be extended to such community, he may by notification in the Gazette of India declare that the provisions of this Act with the substitution of the word "Kojas" or "Khoja" as the case may be, for the word "Hindus" or "Hindu" wherever those words occur, shall apply to that community in such area as may be specified in the notification, and this Act shall thereupon have effect accordingly.

1739. Its scope.—As Ss. 13, 14 and 20 of the Transfer of Property Act correspond with Ss. 100 and 101 of the Succession Act, the above Act has the effect of legalizing the disposition of property whether by transfer, settlement, gift or will for the benefit of a person not in existence to the extent permitted by those sections, that is to say, to the following extent:—

A person may dispose of his property to any person but he is not permitted to transfer any but an absolute estate, i.e., his whole and entire estate in favour of an unborn person when the transfer in favour of him is to take effect after the determination of the prior interest created by the same transfer and the disposition itself, whether of the whole or of limited interest, cannot be created so as to last for one or more existing lives, plus 18 years (and the period of gestation in case of a possible issue).

In other words, his disposition must be absolute after a period and it must not offend against the rule as to perpetuity.<sup>(1)</sup>

Such transfers cannot, of course, be made without the intervention of a trustee.<sup>(2)</sup>

The provisions of S. 101 of the Succession Act are not only enacted as S. 14 of the Transfer of Property Act but have been adopted as S. 2 of the Hindu Wills Act<sup>(3)</sup> and of the Oudh Estates Act.<sup>(4)</sup>

1740. Religious endowment.—Gifts and bequests being everywhere commended by the religious law it follows that no legal restriction as is involved in the rule against perpetuity and remoteness can apply to such a gift.<sup>(5)</sup>

But the gift must be in reality for the object, and not a mask for circumventing the rule against perpetuities. (1)

through its manager or shebait, the nature of the title is in no way different from that of a living individual. There is no distinction in this respect between a family idol and an idol installed in a temple for public worship. Hindu Law recognizes a gift made in favour of such an idol to the same extent as a gift in favour of a deity in the abstract and will give effect to it even if a portion of the income of the gifted property is set apart for the maintenance of certain members of the family or of the manager and administrator of the trust. (2) The question in such case is whether the disposition was a real or a fictitious endowment.

Such an endowment may be made whether for the benefit of an existent or non-existent idol of a named deity (3) in whose favour the endowment is constituted. An endowment for the benefit of an unnamed deity such as "the Thakurji in his Thakurdevara" without mentioning the "Thakurji" was held to be too vague to be valid. (4) But in this and similar cases the rule to apply is certum est quia certum reddi potest. (5) The testator had in the last case devised his eight shops in favour of "Shri Thakurji of the Thakurdevara situated in Kasha Pusanpur" which description was apparently insufficient to identify any deity. Such were devises to "Dharm" which failed for vagueness. (6)

1742. Charities.—A gift or devise may be made regardless of the rule against perpetuities in favour of any charitable object, such as a Sadavart (or delivery of food to all comers) (7) an avala (i.e., a water trough for animals to drink from) (8) the maintenance of choultries (or shelter for travellers), (9) hospitals, (10) a university, (11) a lecturership, (12) or in fact any object of public utility or benevolence.

1743. But a gift to Brahmins is a personal gift, though inspired with a religious motive. It does not therefore fall within the exception applicable to religious or charitable endowments. (13)

Conditional gift or devise.

175. (1) A gift or devise may be absolute or conditional.

(2) A conditional gift or devise takes effect upon the fulfilment of the condition, except in the following cases:—

(a) Where the condition is a condition subsequent,

(b) where it is illegal or immoral,

(c) or is repugnant to the nature of the grant.

(3) A substantial fulfilment of the condition may be sufficient if its literal fulfilment is impossible or impracticable.

(4) A gift once completed cannot be revoked except on the ground which would suffice to cancel a contract.

1744. Analogous Law.—Conditional transfers are subject to the provisions of Ss. 25-27 of the Transfer of Property Act and conditional bequests subject to those of Ss. 113-117 of the Succession Act. And as there is nothing in Hindu Law to the contrary <sup>(1)</sup> their principles are equally applicable to Hindus. The Privy Council have upheld the validity of conditional gifts holding it competent to the donor to create an absolute estate defeasible on the failure of issue. <sup>(2)</sup> So where the donor gave a taluq to his sister for her support and "for the generation born of your womb successively and no other heirs of yours shall have a right or interest" it was held that the grant was absolute and defeasible on the failure of issue living at the death of the donee. <sup>(3)</sup>

The subject will be further examined in the chapter on wills.

1745. Gift is irrevocable.—The following texts bear on the subject of Cl. (4). this clause:—

What is given by a person in wrath or excessive joy, or through inadvertance or during disease, minority or madness or under the influence of terror or by one intoxicated or extremely old or by an outcaste or idiot or by a man afflicted with grief or with pain or what is given in sport all this is declared ungiven or void. consideration unperformed or to a bad man mistaken for a good one, or for any illegal act, the owner may take it back. (1)

Yajnavalkya :—Let the acceptance be public especially of immoveable property and delivering what may be given and has been promised, let not a wise man resume a donation(2).

Dayabhag :—Accordingly Harit says "A father during his life distributing his property may retire to the forest or enter into the order suitable to an aged man ; or he may remain at home having distributed small allotments and keeping a greater portion ; should he become indigent he may take back from them." (3)

A gift once completed cannot be revoked (4) except upon grounds which suffice to cancel a contract. (5) Such grounds are fraud, misrepresentation undue influence and the like. In this respect Hindu Law agrees with the statutory provisions contained in S. 126 of the Transfer of Property Act.

With the solitary exception of the Dayabhag text all texts declare a gift irrevocable, Katyayan even going so far as to make the offer of a gift for a religious purpose specifically enforceable. But though this part of the law contravenes the express provisions of the statute law and is therefore obsolete, the fact remains that Hindu Law does not countenance the resumption of a gift.

CHAPTER XVII.

WILLS.

1746. Topical Introduction.—Hindu Law as such contains no provision for wills which have come into vogue in the following manner described by the Privy Council: "As to gifts by way of will, whatever doubts may have once been entertained by learned persons as to the existence of the testamentary power, those doubts have been dispelled by a course of practice in itself enough, if necessary, to establish an approved usage and legal series of judicial decisions both here and in India proceeding upon the assumption that gifts by will are legally binding, and recognizing the validity of that form of the gift as part and parcel of the general law. The introduction of gifts by will into general use has followed in India as it has done in other countries, the conveyance of properties inter vivos. The same may be said of the Roman law. Such a disposition of property to take effect upon the death of the donor, though revocable in his life time is, until revocation, a continuous act of gift up to the moment of death, and does then operate to give the property disposed of to the persons designated as beneficiaries. They take upon the death of the testator as they would if he had given the property to them in his life-time. There is no law expressly and in terms applicable to persons who can so take. The law of wills has however grown up, so to speak, naturally from a law which furnishes no analogy but that of gifts and it is the duty of a tribunal dealing with a case new in the instance, to be governed by the established principles and the analogies which have hitherto prevailed in like cases." (1)

1747. In the presidency of Bengal and the towns of Madras and Bombay the law of wills is now subject to the Hindu Wills Act<sup>(2)</sup> which extends certain sections of the Succession Act to Hindu wills. It has been held in Madras that the provisions of this Act may be referred to in the construction of even mofussil wills, embodying as it does, principles in consonance with equity, justice and good conscience. (3)

Thus the testamentary power though a graft upon the archaic law has now become well established.

The ensuing sections present the leading principles thus evolved out of the analogies from gifts.

176. (1) Will is the expression of a person's wish with reference to his property which he desires to be carried into effect after his death.
 "Will" and "codicil" defined.

(2) Where the will is in writing, it may be modified by an instrument, made in relation thereto and explaining, altering or adding to its dispositions. This instrument is called a codicil. It is considered as forming an additional part of the will.

| (3) Legal declaration relating to property (1751-1752). | (6) English rules of construction, inapplicable (1754). |

1748. Analogous Law.—The definition of “will” and “codicil” here given is adapted from the following definitions of these terms to be found in the Succession Act (1) and reproduced in the Probate and Administration Act (2):—

(3) “Will” is the legal declaration of the intentions of the testator with respect to his property which he desires to be carried into effect after his death.

“Codicil” means an instrument made in relation to a will and explaining altering or adding to its dispositions. It is considered as forming an additional part of the will.

1749. These definitions cannot bodily be incorporated into the Hindu Code because the Hindu notion of a will is much wider than that contemplated in these acts. Taking the “will” first, the statute requires that it should be in the form of a “declaration” which should be “legal” that is, as to its form and substance, in conformity with law. But Hindu Law considers an informal and even a casual statement as sufficient. Under the Succession Act a declaration must be in writing signed by the testator in the presence of two witnesses.

But neither writing nor execution, nor its attestation by two witnesses is required to complete a Hindu will.

Again the statutory definition is inaptly worded, since it defines a will with reference to the “testator” who is the author of a will—a definition obscurum ab obscurius.

As regards the definition of “codicil” the statutory definition postulates the existence of a written will and a “codicil” is therefore naturally defined as an instrument explaining or modifying its terms.

There can be no oral codicil, though an oral will may be explained, altered added to or cancelled by another will and this may go on till the last will remains which alone is operative.

1750. Pre-requisites of a will.—It will be seen from the wording of the rule here formulated that a will is a declaration—but a declaration which must possess the following five essential elements:—

- (1) It must be legal.
- (2) It must relate to a disposition of property.

(1) S. 8, Act X of 1865.

(2) S. 8, Act V of 1931.

(3) It must relate to the testator's property, or property over which he has disposing power. (1)

(4) It must dispose it of as to take effect from the testator's death.

(5) It must be revocable at the testator's pleasure.

1751. Legal declaration.—The first essential of a will is that it must be a declaration and the declaration must be legal. A declaration implies a formal statement intended to be acted upon, not necessarily surrounded by any solemn form but nevertheless made with a degree of seriousness so as to impress on it the stamp of deliberation. Both under the Succession Act and the Hindu Wills Act as under the Oudh Estates Act, such declaration must be in writing signed by the testator in the presence of two witnesses. Any declaration otherwise made is not legal. But under Hindu Law such declaration may be made in any form oral or in writing in a formal instrument or in an informal conversation, provided it expresses the testator's intention.

1752. Strictly speaking a Hindu non-statutory will cannot be designated a declaration at all; since law allows the utmost latitude in its construction considering only the intention and ignoring the mode of expression except only so far as it throws any light on the intention. As such the definition is somewhat too narrow, taken as it is from the statute applicable to a more developed condition of society.

Ignoring for the present the statutory definition and taking the term "declaration" as synonymous with an expression of intention, a will may be constituted in any form of expression, a petition, or a letter or in fact—any document the context of which may bear no relation to the statement which constitutes the will.

1753. Will distinguished from gift.—Although the notion of wills is evolved out of gifts, the two classes of disposition are distinguishable and must be distinguished. A gift confers a present interest, relates to existing property and takes effect immediately; while a will confers a deferred interest, may comprise future property and does not take effect until the death of the testator. (2) A gift once completed cannot be revoked; but a will may be revoked at any time and is by its nature ambulatory and revocable by the testator and again and again by him. (3)

Then again a person may give what he cannot devise. In this respect the power of gift and devise are not identical. (4)

be construed in the light of Hindu Law alone, without any mixture of laws or ideas derived from any foreign source. Technical rules of English law which owe their origin and existence to an entirely different system of personal and property law are altogether foreign to Hindu Law and ideas and ought not to be applied in the construction of Hindu gifts and wills. (1) For instance, the distribution adopted by the law of England in the course of inheritance between inheritable freehold and personalty is not known in Hindu law. (2) So the principle of joint tenancy is unknown to Hindu Law, except in the case of co-parcenary between the members of an undivided family. So where a testator bequeathed a four-annas share of a zamindari to his youngest widow and her son "for your maintenance" with power of alienation, the donees would take as joint tenants, under English law, but by Hindu Law they take as tenants in common, though under both laws the conveyance of her interest by the widow would have the effect of severing the joint interest. (3)

Who may make a will.

177. (1) Any adult person may bequeath his estate by will.

(2) His power to bequeath an estate by will is co-extensive with his power over the estate in his life-time.

(3) What property can be bequeathed (1757-1759).

(2) Power of bequest (1756).

1755. Analogous Law.—The Indian Majority Act excepts only Hindus as regards, marriage, dower, divorce and adoption but not as to the power to make a will, which is subject to it. (4) Consequently, a person, though major under the Hindu personal law but not so under the statute, is not competent to make a bequest. (5) Where, therefore, a guardian is appointed or declared under the Guardian and Wards Act, the minority of the ward does not cease till he attains the age of 21 years and he is incompetent to make a will, it being immaterial whether the guardian dies, is removed, or otherwise ceases to act. (6)

1756. Power of bequest.—The testator's competency to make a will is distinct from its validity. The former depends upon his age, the latter upon his disposing power. (7) A person cannot make a bequest of property which he could not have conveyed by a transfer inter vivos. The rule on the subject was thus stated by Willes, J : "The analogous law in this case is to be found in that applicable to gifts, and even if wills were not universally to be regarded in all respects as gifts to take effect upon death, they are generally so to be regarded as to the property which they can transfer and the persons to whom it can be transferred." (8) "The power of a Hindu to make a will is not of modern introduction nor is it of local origin. Wills were known to and in use amongst Hindus not in the presidency towns only, but from one end of the peninsula to the other. The right to make a will is part of Hindu Law itself.

The extent and nature of the disposition which a Hindu testator is capable of making is not a question of public expediency or of custom or usage, but must be regulated by the rules to be found in or directly deduced from Hindu Law. <sup>(1)</sup>

1757. Now since a Hindu co-parcener is only permitted to alien his undivided interest inter vivos for value, it follows that he has neither the power to alien it by gift or bequest. <sup>(2)</sup> And as in Upper India he does not possess even that power, it is clear that a co-parcener can nowhere alien his interest by will, except in Bengal where the co-parcener being competent to make a gift of his interest, he is held equally competent to devise it by will so as to deprive the widow of her share on partition. <sup>(3)</sup>

1758. And since a widow is incompetent to transfer by gift her limited estate, it follows that she has no power to bequeath it even with the consent of the next reversioner. <sup>(4)</sup> But she is not incapacitated by her sex from bequeathing property to which she is absolutely entitled. <sup>(5)</sup>

So a person may make a bequest of his self-acquired property <sup>(6)</sup> or even his ancestral property if he had no co-parceners at the time <sup>(7)</sup> since the right of alienation in such cases is subject to the right of co-parceners. Hence the son may challenge the father's bequest even if made before he was born. <sup>(8)</sup>

1759. Since the will takes effect from the death of the testator and co-parcenary interest vests from the moment of conception, <sup>(9)</sup> at the moment of the father's death the right of survivorship is in conflict with the right by devise, and the right by survivorship being the prior title takes precedence to the exclusion of that by devise. <sup>(10)</sup>

It being now settled that the holder of an impartible estate has no co-parceners, it follows that he is competent to will away his estate. <sup>(11)</sup>

178. Except as otherwise provided by the Hindu Wills Act or any other law for the time being in force, a will may be oral or in writing, and if in writing, it need not be registered.

property situated therein. <sup>(1)</sup> As such it extends S. 50 of the Succession Act which prescribes the necessity of writing and attestation by two witnesses who should have witnessed the testator's execution of the will. <sup>(2)</sup>

1761. The Oudh Estates Act <sup>(3)</sup> also extends (inter alia) the same section to wills and codicils made by a Taluqdar or grantee or by his heir or legatee, under the provisions of that Act or any interest therein. And S. 20 of the same Act provides against any bequest to religious and charitable uses of any interest in the estate of more than Rs. 2,000 in value "except by a will executed not less than three months before his death and registered within one month from the date of its execution." <sup>(4)</sup>

Excepting these and other similar provisions, a will may be made orally or in writing and not necessarily in the form of a formal bequest, provided it conveys with sufficient clearness the intention of the maker as to the disposal of his property on his death.

1762. Form immaterial.—Such disposal may be made by a petition filed before a Revenue official <sup>(5)</sup> or a statement made to him <sup>(6)</sup> or a tabular statement of heirs filed before him, <sup>(7)</sup> statement made to a settlement officer, or found recorded in the wajibularz <sup>(8)</sup> the value of which must, of course, depend in each case on the circumstances in which it was originally made, and the corroboration it receives from extrinsic evidence. <sup>(9)</sup> So statements made in a deed of settlement at the time of adoption as to what should be done by the executant's adopted son and his wife after his life-time have the effect of a will. <sup>(10)</sup> So a will might be embodied in a Sambandh Nirnay Patra, a matrimonial arrangement deed executed in the form of a letter which the father wrote to the aunt of his future son-in-law stipulating that he should live in his house and take possession of the executant's estate on his demise. <sup>(11)</sup>

1763. In another case a Taluqdar subject to the Oudh Estates Act had executed a deed of assignment in favour of his brother intended to operate inter vivos but in which he provided that he (the executant) shall enjoy his estate during his life-time and on his death his brother will hold and enjoy it, but should a legitimate son be born to him, then the son and the brother will each get a moiety of his estate. It was contended that this agreement was intended to operate only inter vivos and that not being intended to be a will, it could not have that effect. But the Privy Council overruled this contention holding it to operate as a will. In so holding they said: "If they had been the words of an English conveyancer preparing an English instrument, they would have afforded a very strong argument; but the instrument was prepared by Lal Sunder, and we must not construe with too great nicety, or assign too much weight to the exact words that he uses for a transfer of property, as if he were accurately weighing the difference between a testamentary instrument and one operating inter vivos. We must remember that wills are comparatively new in any part of India, and are of more recent introduction in Oudh in respect of this class of property. So with respect to the reservation of a life-interest. The will being not a very familiar instrument to the people who prepare it or who sign it, the testator often does express a great anxiety that he shall not be considered to have parted with anything in his life-time, and their Lordships have seen here instruments which most unquestionably were wills, and intended to operate as such, in which nevertheless there have been expressions upon the face of them intimating that the testator intends to remain the owner of his property. Upon the whole, therefore, looking at what are the substantial characteristics of the document which has been referred to, setting aside mere matters of form and what may be considered as technical expressions, their Lordships think that reasons for holding it to be a will have a decided preponderance over those which have led them to hold it be a deed." (1)

1784. The same view was taken by the same Board in another case, in which the Taluqdar had executed what he called "by way of deed of adoption and codicil to a will." The deed was clearly testamentary in character; and it was held to be a will in spite of its misleading form and description. (2)

These were more or less formal documents. But a will had been discovered in a power of attorney, (3) in a draft (4) and an unsigned will (5) when the testator died before the draft could be fair copied or where he was too ill to append his signature but possessed sufficient consciousness to assent to it.

1785. From these and similar cases, it is clear that whatever may be the form of the instrument, whether it is formal or informal, a deed, jotting or a memorandum, the one thing essential is, has it the effect of a will? Now since the one characteristic distinguishing feature of a will is its revocability it follows that if the grant was revocable then it is a will; otherwise it is not. (6) The fact that the grant is stated to operate in presenti or that it is expressed to be operative in future is, though relevant, equally indecisive, since there is no magic in the future tense. (7) The fact that the document is called an agreement is no doubt a circumstance which cannot be ignored, but it should not be overrated. As stated in a case, "this per se is not much." (8) So conversely, the fact that document is called a will does not make it so unless it has that effect. Such was the document executed by the father who divided his estate amongst his sons and after setting out its details provided that "If I at any time come back from pilgrimages and find mismanagement or the character of an one bad, then I shall have power to cancel this will which shall be enforced from the date of its execution." And it concluded thus, "All the three sons were put in separate possession of the estate in the beginning of the year 1303 Fasli. I have no other heir having a right besides those mentioned in this will. I have therefore executed this will in order that it may serve as evidence". On the father's death two of his sons sued for partition on the strength of this "will". The defence was that the deed was a partition deed, and was miscalled a will. The Privy Council held it to be a family arrangement, (9) by which all the sons were bound.

It is said that an instrument which confers or reserves a life estate to the maker is not a will. <sup>(1)</sup> But it is submitted that this statement is too wide, since there is nothing to prevent the testator from executing a composite deed reserving a life-interest for himself. <sup>(2)</sup>

1766. Nuncupative will.—A Hindu is entitled to dispose of his property whether moveable or immoveable by an oral will <sup>(3)</sup> which may or may not be reduced to writing after the testator's death. <sup>(4)</sup> But since it is easy to set up a false oral will and difficult to disprove it, law requires the very strictest proof of such oral disposition. As the Privy Council said: "But if any party is bound to strictness of pleading, it is he who sets up a nuncupative will. He who rests his case on so uncertain a foundation as the spoken words of a man, since deceased, is bound to allege as well as to prove with the utmost precision, the words on which he relies, with every circumstance of time and place." <sup>(5)</sup> A verbal disposition of property though permissive must be supported by the very best evidence. It must be not only proved that the will was verbal, but also why it was not reduced to writing. And in judging of its factum the court will pay special regard to whether it is a natural or an officious will.

Power defined. 179. (1) "Power" is a right which a person acquires over another, or over things not his own.

(2) The person who confers the power may be called the donor of the power, and the person upon whom it is conferred, the donee of the power.

(3) The exercise of power is discretionary with the donee.

Hindu Law recognizes powers of which the power of adoption conferred by the husband upon his wife, the power of appointment, the power to appoint an heir <sup>(7)</sup> or an executor <sup>(8)</sup> are examples. But the exercise of power by a Hindu is necessarily subject to and circumscribed by the requirements of his personal law and while the English law on powers furnishes analogies, it is not to be applied generally to Hindu wills. (1)

1768. In English law power is defined to be authority reserved by or of, either wholly or partially real or personal property, either for his own benefit or that of others. (2) Power may be at common law, equitable or that operating under the statute of uses. (3) A common law power is an authority given by one person to another to do an act for him which his recognised and operative at common law. A power of attorney is an instance of such power which is equally available to a Hindu.

1769. An equitable power is a power which affects the equitable and not the legal estate or interest. Sugden distinguishes the two powers as follows: "Powers are either common law authorities or declarations or directions operating only on the conscience of the person in whom the legal estate is vested; or declarations or directions deriving their effect from the statute of uses. . . . A power to dispose of an estate, or a sum of money where the legal interest is vested in another, is a power of the second sort. The legal interest is not divested by the exercise of the power, but equity will compel the person seized of it to clothe the estate created with the legal right." (4)

1770. A power is distinguished from a trust in that in the one the estate vests in the donee by whom the exercise of power conferred on him is purely discretionary, while in the other the estate does not vest in the trustee except for a specific purpose and he has no discretion, being merely the instrument of the author for execution of the purpose for which the trust is created. (5) A power left unexecuted lapses, since its execution is personal to the donee but powers, in the nature of trusts, that is, when they amount to trusts in the garb of powers, the failure of the donee to exercise them will not prejudice the intended objects, since the court will in, such cases, execute them. (6) Whether particular words constitute a trust or power is a question of intention and not of grammatical import. (7) Powers over real estates are either (1) powers of ownership (2) powers collateral or (3) powers relating to the estate of the donee of the power in the land, and these are sub-divided into powers appendant and in gross. The first is a power which gives the donee complete dominion though no ownership in the estate; the second is a bare power conferred upon a person who is given no interest in the land, such as a mere power of sale; while the third is a power coupled with the transfer of ownership. It is appendant where the estate created by its exercise affects the interest of the donee of the power; it is gross where it does not affect his interest.

1771. A power may be general or special. It is general where the donee is at liberty to exercise it in favour of any person he chooses. It is special where it can only be exercised in favour of certain specified persons. To borrow an example from Hindu Law where the testator empowers his widow to make an adoption, she possesses a general power of adoption; but where he empowers her to adopt a persona designata such as the person named A she has a special power. Powers may be given to a person for the purpose of managing either his own or another person's property, or they may be to appoint to various offices, such as the power of appointing new trustees, which loom large in English law and are of the most general importance.

1772. Creation and exercise of powers.—Under English law powers relate to property, but under Hindu Law they may relate both to persons and property. This is due to the parental authority which still survives the patria potestas. The power of adoption has been already been the subject of a previous discussion (§§ 27-29). It is stated there that the father possessed the power to authorize his widow to make an adoption. (1) He is also conceded the power of appointing a guardian of his minor children (§ 59). He is equally entitled to confer upon a person the power of appointing an heir. Such a case arose upon the following facts: A testator had devised his immoveable property upon trust for the income to be appropriated to the maintenance of his widow and of his daughter Mamu and the children that might be born of her, the property to be divided among the heirs of such children. If there should not be any children born of the daughter the property under the will should devolve upon them "to whom she might direct it to be delivered by making her will." The daughter having had no children and questions having arisen between the daughter and the widow as to the administration of the estate according to the will it was held that there was no absolute gift to the daughter, and that the persons to whom the property was given, though to be designated by her, did not take the gift from her, but from the testator. In so holding the Privy Council said: "The remaining question is whether his substituting Mamu, and giving her power to designate the person by her will is contrary to any principle of Hindu Law. There is no analogy to it in the law of adoption. A man may, by will, authorize his widow to adopt a son to him, to do what he had power to do himself, and although there is a strong religious obligation, their Lordships think that the law as to adoption shows that such a power as that now in question is not contrary to any principle of Hindu Law. Further, they think that the reasons which have led to a testamentary power becoming part of the Hindu Law are applicable to this power, and that it is their duty to hold it to be valid. But whilst saying this, they think they ought also to say that, in their opinion, the English law of powers is not fit to be applied generally to Hindu wills." (2) Similar construction was placed by the same high tribunal on a will in which the testator had bequeathed his estate to his wife and on her death to her daughter-in-law and thereafter "she shall have power to nominate any one whom she may think fit as, "heir" so that the name of the family may continue as formerly with honour." (3)

1773. It was at one time held that in order to be operative the donee of the power must have been in existence at the death of the testator. (4) But since the passing of the Hindu Disposition of Property Act this is by no means now necessary, and the Hindu Law of appointment and power is now subject only to the provisions of that Act and Ss. 13, 14 and 20 of the Transfer of Property Act.

1774. In one case the testator made a bequest to such person "and in such manner as his brother Jamnadas should by deed or deeds, writing or writings appoint, with or without power of revocation or new appointment." It was held that there was no principle of Hindu Law which forbade such a bequest being construed and given effect to according to its plain and literal terms ; always however, subject to the same restrictions as the Hindu testamentary law imposes on the testator himself, viz., that the appointment should be made so that the appointee might be ascertained when the event arose on which he was to take. In this case the testator had by his will after appointing his brother J. to be his executor bequeathed all his estate to J. (i) upon trust to pay his debts and the residue in trust for the testator's wife and the wife of the executor J. during the life of both, or the survivor of them for their or her sole use ; (ii) and from and after the decease of the survivor of them in trust for the male issue of J. if any there were ; and (iii) in default of such male issue in trust for any person or persons in any shares or share, and in such manner as his brother J. should, by any deed or deeds, or writing or writings, appoint, with or without power of revocation or new appointment". The court upheld the last as a valid power of appointment which was not opposed to any principle of Hindu Law. (1)

1775. The conferral of power must of course be legal. For instance, the husband possesses the power to authorize only his wife to make an adoption. If, therefore, he authorizes his widow who was also the executrix of his will conjointly with two other executors, the power is void. (2)

1776. But there is nothing illegal in a testator conferring two or more separate powers upon separate individuals. So where the testator empowered his two wives to make patni settlement of his immoveable property and empowered three other persons to arrange for the performance of the family rites and ceremonies and the debts and dues, the court upheld them as in no way clashing with one another. (3) Where a testator leaves a kam out of a certain land to a certain person, the whole land measuring more, the legatee has the right of selection and is entitled to one Ram out of a specified portion of the estate. (4)

180. (1) A will made in accordance with the Hindu Wills Act must be proved as therein required.

(2) A will otherwise executed must be proved so as to show that it is a complete instrument and expresses the deliberate intentions of the testator.

(3) The words of an oral will must be proved with the utmost precision, with every circumstance of time and place.

case of a soldier employed in an expedition, or engaged in actual warfare, or a mariner at sea, every other person must execute his will which must be attested by two witnesses.

1778. Where the will is in writing but is not subject to the Hindu Wills Act, it need not be attested. It need not even conform to the provisions of a privileged will, <sup>(1)</sup> in that it is subject to no formal rules and need not be even be signed by the testator, <sup>(2)</sup> all that is necessary being that it be a complete instrument, and express the deliberate intention of the testator. It need not be attested <sup>(3)</sup> and even if attested, it may be proved otherwise than by calling the attesting witnesses <sup>(4)</sup>

1779. Nuncupative will.—A nuncupative will is valid. <sup>(5)</sup> "But if any party is bound, in strictness of pleading, it is he who sets up a nuncupative will. He who rests his title on so uncertain a foundation as the spoken words of a man, since deceased, is bound to allege, as well as to prove, with the utmost precision, the words on which he relies with every circumstance of time and place". <sup>(6)</sup>

1780. The question whether the will was an officious or an inofficious will is material as operating upon its probability or improbability. <sup>(7)</sup> The court will treat an officious will as prima facie improbable, being regardless of the ordinary preferences <sup>(8)</sup> of natural ties and affection. So where a person subject to the Mitakshara law made in a will favour of the first cousin who lived in joint estate with him to the disinherison of his widow except a small provision for her maintenance in the event of her leaving the family home, the will was held, in the circumstances, proved. <sup>(9)</sup> But this is a question of antecedent probability upon which the English Judges rely upon the opinion of Hindu Judges who are more conversant with the habits and trend of thought of their co-religionists. <sup>(10)</sup> So on the point of vernacular writing the opinion of a native Judge is to be preferred to that of a European. As their Lordships observed, "Now with great respect for the knowledge which the two learned Judges of the High Court possessed, as their Lordships doubt not, of the Bengali language, their Lordships cannot but think that upon such a point as that the native Judge, examining a letter in his own alphabet, is more likely to be a competent Judge than the two European judges." <sup>(11)</sup> These remarks occur with reference to the construction of the letter which the moribund testator was stated to have mustered strength to write, for the word "Manzur," (or "Agreed") which the Sadar Amin had held to be in the testator's handwriting from whom the High Court had disagreed. After expressing their preference to the native Judge their Lordships proceeded: "But it is impossible from the mere inspection of the letter, as it appears to their Lordships, to be able to predicate with any degree of

It is impossible to say what momentary rally of strength might take place to do an act of such brevity as that: and therefore, their Lordships are unable to give to that, which is after all merely the impression of these two Judges derived from actual inspection, the weight which has been given to it".<sup>(1)</sup>

1781. A will is not invalidated merely because some person other than the devisee is competent to confer greater spiritual benefit on the testator: nor is it invalidated on the ground of there being no provision for the maintenance of the widow of the deceased brother of the testator.<sup>(2)</sup> The will of a childless Hindu giving power to adopt a son, though opposed to the interests of the widow and the next heir in reversion, is not officious.<sup>(3)</sup>

Under English law a will traced to the testator's possession and not forthcoming at his death, is presumed to have been destroyed by him animo revocandi. But the same degree of presumption, if at all, does not arise under Hindu Law.<sup>(4)</sup>

(2) Subject to any law for the time being in force, such revocation may be oral though the will itself be in writing.

1782. Analogous Law.—The revocation of a will made under the Hindu Wills Act is subject to the following provisions of the Succession Act. (1)

S. 57. No unprivileged or codicil nor any part thereof shall be revoked otherwise than by marriage, or by another will or codicil, or by some writing declaring an intention to revoke the same and executed in the manner in which an unprivileged will is hereinbefore required to be executed, or by the burning, tearing or otherwise destroying the same by the testator or by some person in his presence and by his direction with the intention of revoking the same. This is sanctioned by the Hindu usage under which, however, a will is revocable without any of the restrictions enacted in the Succession Act. All that is necessary is intention.<sup>(2)</sup> This was the law of England before the Statute of Frauds was passed.<sup>(3)</sup> It is not necessary that the will itself should be cancelled, torn up or destroyed. Nor indeed need the revocation be formal or in writing.<sup>(4)</sup> But though this is the law, its dangers are obvious and as the Privy Council said: "Their Lordships are very sensible of the danger of acting upon such evidence as is ordinarily produced in the courts in India in order to establish such a revocation and they desire to say nothing which may induce those courts to apply the law in such cases otherwise than with extreme caution."<sup>(5)</sup> This passage occurs in a judgment in which their Lordships had to consider the oral revocation of a written will which though ordered to be, was in fact, never destroyed. It was however supported by his subsequent conduct. The same view was taken in another case in which one Venkata Rao had during his illness made a will disposing of his property to his wife, his daughter, and her son in succession. On recovering from his illness he executed a power of attorney appointing a pleader to obtain the will out of the Registry and to restore it to him. Owing to some blunder this was not done for the testator had cancelled some grants recited in it. For 20 years after his death no one claimed under it, the effect of which all was held to justify the finding that the will had been revoked.<sup>(6)</sup>

1783. Revocation of will.—The power of revocation at will is a necessary incident of a will and inherent in the maker who may make and unmake it as he chooses till the hour of his death.<sup>(7)</sup> Persons may agree to make mutual wills which remain revocable during their joint lives by either with notice to the other. But where the joint will is a disposition by each testator of his own property without any arrangement between the two, the will is revocable at the will of either and cannot be proved till the death of the survivor.<sup>(8)</sup>

1784. A will, whether single or joint, is revocable. No formal words are necessary to constitute revocation. As Lord Denman, C. J., said: "Some doubt has been entertained whether any declaration could be sufficient without the word 'revoke' but upon full consideration, we think it impossible so to limit the testator's power of revocation, and that any equivalent words or words and expressions would be sufficient for that purpose."

"But further, we are now required to consider whether without any language at all, a testator may revoke a will by the conduct he exhibits.

And this appears to be tantamount to an enquiry whether conduct can give a positive declaration of intent. If it can, there can be no more necessity for words than for the use of a particular expression. Now, nothing is easier than to imagine such gestures and proceedings connected with the will, as must fully convince every rational mind that the testator intended to revoke his will, and thought he had done so by the means he took for that purpose. But if he who has power to revoke by declaring a present resolution then to do so, does in fact make that resolution manifest, it seems clear that the act of revocation is complete in every essential." <sup>(1)</sup> It is thus clear that all that is necessary to effect revocation is the animo revocandi and that revocation may be express or implied by words, acts or conduct leading to an irresistible conclusion that the testator had cancelled his will.

1785. But though this is the rule its logical possibility must not be confused with its reasonable application. The court will, indeed, demand very clear, cogent and consistent proof of an oral revocation of a written will and such evidence must necessarily be most precise as to time and place.

1786. A will may contain its own terms of revocation. Such was the will of a testator who had stated in the preamble to it that it was executed for that year only. He died without doing anything afterwards to indicate his intention to keep it as a testamentary instrument and it was held that the will had no force whatever and that the testator must be presumed to have died intestate. <sup>(2)</sup>

1787. Effect of marriage and birth or adoption of son.—Under S. 56 of the Succession Act marriage operates as revocation of the will. But this section has not been extended to Hindus under the Hindu Wills Act which leaves their common law on the subject intact which contains no provision on wills and consequently no such provision as is enacted in the Succession Act. Neither marriage nor the birth or adoption of a son <sup>(3)</sup> has the effect of revocation, though, as already remarked, the son may defeat a devise by his own claim by survivorship.

1788. In England a presumption of revocation arises from the non-discovery of the will last shown to be in possession of the testator. <sup>(4)</sup> But no such presumption arises in this country. <sup>(5)</sup> Even in England it raises only a presumption more or less varying in strength with the circumstances of each case. As Lord Campbell, C. J., said, "Certainly the fact of the will being last traced to the possession of the testator and not being found is not conclusive that he cancelled it. If, for instance, it could be shown that the heir at law had access to the place where the testator had deposited the will and grounds could be shown for a suspicion that he had destroyed it, it would be a case to consider.” (1) And there is no presumption at all, unless there is evidence to satisfy the court that the will was not in existence at the time of the testator's death. This presumption owes its existence to the habits of the people who preserve with care all their deeds and wills. But the same presumption cannot extend to people who are permitted to make an oral will, and whose muniments of title are not preserved with the same degree of care. As observed by the Privy Council in a case decided in 1838: “Now the rule of the law of evidence on this subject as established by a course of decisions in the ecclesiastical courts is this: that if a will, traced to the possession of the deceased and last seen there, is not forthcoming on his death, it is presumed to have been destroyed by himself and that presumption must have effect, unless there is sufficient evidence to repel it. It is a presumption founded on good sense; for it is highly reasonable to suppose that an instrument of so much importance would be carefully preserved by a person of ordinary caution in some place of safety and would not be either lost or stolen; and if on the death of the maker, it is not found in his usual repositories or elsewhere where he resides, it is in a high degree probable that the deceased himself had probably destroyed it. But this presumption, like all others, yields to circumstances which raise a higher degree of probability to the contrary. The onus of proof of such circumstances is undoubtedly on the party propounding the will.” (2)

1789. The Calcutta court followed this rule in a case in which they held that the court may presume revocation of a will last traced to the testator and shown to be non-existent at his death. Such a presumption is however a presumption of fact which the court may make under S. 114 of the Evidence Act. But regard must be had to other circumstances. As the court remarked: “The presumption subject to these qualifications may no doubt be applied in this country with due regard to the special conditions prevalent here, where deeds are not kept and preserved with the same care and where their preservation is more difficult. And there is another presumption, which, having regard to the habits of the people of this country and especially to those of a wandering Fakir may well arise, namely that, when a document like this is not forthcoming, after the testator's death, it has been mislaid.” (3)

182. (1) A will or any part thereof is void if it is brought about by coercion, fraud, undue influence, misrepresentation or by such importunity as deprives the maker of his free will.

(2) And if the maker of a will is induced by the same means to alter or revoke his will, or is prevented from altering it, it will have the same effect which the maker had intended.

Explanation.—The importunity, undue influence and misrepresentation under this section must be such as amounts to fraud or force destroying the free agency of the testator.

1790. Analogous Law.—This section is adapted from S. 148 of the Succession Act which is extended by the Hindu Wills Act to Hindus subject to that Act. But even apart from that Act, the section enunciates a general principle which is equally applicable to cases not subject to that Act. (1)

1791. Free will.—To be operative the will must emanate from the free will of the maker. This does not mean that the making of a will must originate with the testator; (2) nor is it required that proof should be given of the commencement of such a transaction, provided it be proved that the testator completely understood, adopted and sanctioned the disposition proposed to him, and that the instrument, if made, itself embodied such disposition. (3) If a part of a will has been obtained by fraud or any of the other means above enumerated it is to that extent invalid unless it alters the sense of the remainder so that there is a question whether there is a valid will at all. (4)

1792. Force and fraud are sufficient to vitiate all transactions. As such, they vitiate a will. But apart from these, a will may be vitiated if it is caused by the exercise of undue influence. As Eyre, C. B., said: "There is another ground which though not so distinct as that of actual force, nor so easy to be proved, yet if it should be made out, would certainly destroy the will; that is, if a dominion was acquired by any person over a mind of sufficient sanity to general purposes, and of sufficient soundness and discretion to regulate his affairs in general; yet if such a dominion or influence were acquired over him as to prevent the exercise of such discretion, it would be equally inconsistent with the idea of a disposing mind." (5) To which Williams adds in his work on Executors: "But the influence to vitiate an Act must amount to force and coercion, destroying free agency; it must not be the influence of affection and attachment; it must not be the mere desire of gratifying the wishes of another, for that would be a very strong ground in support of a testamentary act; further, there must be proof that the act was dictated by this coercion; by importunity which could not be resisted; that it was done merely for the sake of peace ; so that the motive was tantamount to force and fear." (1)

1793. The same view was taken by Lord Cranworth in delivering the judgment of the House of Lords, in the course of which he said: "In a popular sense, we often speak of a person exercising undue influence over another, when the influence certainly is not of a nature which would invalidate a will. A young man is often led into dissipation by following the example of a companion of riper years, to whom he looks up, and who leads him to consider habits of dissipation as venial, and perhaps even creditable; the companion is then correctly said to exercise an undue influence. But if in these circumstances, the young man, influenced by his regard for the person who has thus led him astray were to make a will and leave to him everything he possessed, such a will certainly could not be impeached on the ground of undue influence. Nor would the case be altered merely because the companion had urged, or even importuned, the young man to dispose his property: provided only, that in making such a will, the young man was really carrying into effect his own intention, formed without either coercion or fraud. I must further remark that all the difficulties of defining the point at which influence exerted over the mind of a testator becomes so pressing as to be properly described as coercion are greatly enhanced when the question is one between husband and wife. The relation constituted by marriage is of a nature which makes it as difficult to inquire, as it would be impolitic to permit inquiry, into all which may have passed in the intimate union of affections and interests which it is the paramount purpose of that connection to cherish."

"In order therefore, to have something to guide us in our inquiries on this very difficult subject, I am prepared to say that influence, in order to be undue within the meaning of any rule of law which would make it sufficient to vitiate a will, must be an influence exercised by coercion or by fraud. In the interpretation, indeed, of these words some latitude must be allowed. In order to come to the conclusion that a will has been obtained by coercion, it is not necessary to establish that actual violence has been used, or even threatened. The conduct of a person in vigorous health towards one feeble in body, even though not unsound in mind, may be such as to excite terror and make him execute as his will an instrument which, if he had been free from such influence, he would not have executed. Imaginary terrors may have been created sufficient to deprive him of free agency; a will thus made may possibly be described as obtained by coercion. So as to fraud, if a wife by falsehood, raises prejudices in the mind of her husband against those who would be the natural objects of his bounty, and by contrivance keeps him from intercourse with his relatives, to the end that these impressions which she knows he had thus formed to their disadvantage may never be removed; such contrivance may, perhaps, be equivalent to positive fraud, and may render invalid any will executed under false impressions thus kept alive. It is, however, extremely difficult to state in the abstract what acts will constitute undue influence in questions of this nature. It is sufficient to say, that, allowing a fair latitude of construction, they must range themselves under one or other of these heads—coercion or fraud." (2)

1794. The undue influence vitiating a will must be an influence exercised in relation to the will itself, not an influence in relation to other matters or transactions. But as pointed by Lord Cranworth in the case last cited, this principle must not be carried too far. "Where a jury sees that, at and near the time when the will sought to be impeached was executed, the alleged testator was, in other important transactions, so under the influence of the person benefited by the will, that as to them he was not a free agent, but was acting under a control, the circumstances may be such as fairly to warrant the conclusion, even in the absence of evidence, bearing direct on the execution of the will, that in regard to that also the same undue influence was exercised". (1) So in another case Sir J. Wilde (afterwards Lord Penzance) directed the jury in these words: "To make a good will a man must be a free agent. All influences are not unlawful. . . . But pressure of whatever character, whether acting on the fears or the hopes, if so exerted as to empower the volition without convincing the judgment, is a species of restraint under which no valid will can be made. The importunity or threats, such as the testator had assented and yielded to for the sake of peace and quiet, or of escaping from distress of mind or social discomfort, these if carried to a degree in which the free play of the testator's judgment, discretion, or wishes is overborne, will constitute undue influence, though no force is either used or threatened. In a word, a testator may be led but not driven, and his will must be the offspring of his own volition and not the record of some one else." (2)

1795. It will be thus seen that the term "undue influence" as used in relation to wills has a more limited meaning than it bears as operating on contracts and gifts. They are set aside if it can be shown that by reason of a relationship one was in a position to dominate the will of the other. But in the case of a will, relation is no evidence of coercion or dominion exercised over the testator against his will or of coercion so strong that it could not be resisted. (3)

1796. The question of undue influence must not be mixed up with that of incapacity: since incapacity is one thing and undue influence another, (4) though the proof of one is not irrelevant to the proof of another, (5) since the exercise of undue influence is greatly facilitated by feeble health, produced by disease, distress or age. (6)

183. (1) The burden of proving a will
Burden of proof. lies upon the person who propounds it and not upon the person who impeaches it.

(2) Such proof must comprise not only proof of due execution, but also that the executant was of a sound disposing mind, though if nothing appears to the contrary, this may be presumed.

Explanation.—A person is said to possess a disposing mind if he possesses sufficient understanding and reason to be able

1797. Analogous Law.—Both the clauses of this section are supported by the decisions of the Privy Council. (1) If a party writes or prepares a will under which he takes a benefit, or if any other circumstances exist which excite the suspicion of the Court, and whatever their nature may be, it is for those who propound the will to remove such suspicion, and to prove affirmatively that the testator knew and approved of the contents of the will, and it is only where this is done that the onus is thrown upon those who oppose the will to prove fraud, or undue influence, or whatever they rely on to displace the case for proving the will. (2)

1798. Ordinarily proof of due execution will be sufficient if only execution is proved; it being presumed that the testator was competent. But where his competency is challenged it must be proved as a part of "due execution" that is to say he who proves execution by a person must also affirmatively establish his competency to the extent that he possessed at the time a sound disposing mind. (3)

1799. Disposing mind.—The testator must be known to possess a disposing mind, that is to say, a mind sufficiently sound to understand the nature of the Act. (4) A man may be a monomaniac (5) but it does not incapacitate him from making a will. Even a lunatic may make a will in his lucid intervals, the only difference being that upon proof of general insanity it will be on those relying upon the will to prove its execution during a lucid interval. (6)

1800. The amount of intelligence which constitutes a disposing mind was thus defined by Warren, J: "A man is competent to make his will if he has sufficient memory and intelligence to be able to comprehend the nature of his property, to remember and understand the claims of relations and friends, and to have a judgment of his own in disposing of his property. . . . If a man possesses this amount of memory and intelligence, he is a competent testator; if he is not able to perform the mental acts mentioned, then he is not a competent testator." (7) "It is not sufficient in order to make a will that a man should be able to maintain an ordinary conversation and to answer familiar and easy questions. He must have more mind than suffices for that. He must have what the old lawyers called 'a disposing mind'. He must be able to dispose of his property with understanding and reason. This does not mean that he should make what other people may think a sensible will or a reasonable will, or a kind will . . . But he must be able to understand his position, he must be able to appreciate his property, to form a judgment with respect to the parties whom he chose to benefit by it after death; and if he has capacity for that it suffices." (1)

1801. The term "disposing mind," was then defined by the Privy Council: "In order to constitute a sound disposing mind, a testator must not only be able to understand that he is by his will giving the whole of his property to one object of his regard, but that he must also have capacity to comprehend the extent of his property and the nature of the claims of others whom by his will he is excluding from all participation in his property. . . . The question is not whether Mr. Baker knew when he was giving all his property to his wife and excluding all his other relations from any share in it but whether he was at the time capable of recollecting who those relations were, of understanding their respective claims upon his regard and bounty and of deliberately forming an intelligent purpose of excluding them from any share of his property." (2)

1802. Proof of will.—Two things are essential to the proof of a will, (i)—that the executant had a disposing mind and, (ii)—that he had executed it. Mere proof of execution is not sufficient but if added to execution there is the proof the executant's disposing mind, then the requirements of law are satisfied. It is then on him who challenges its execution to prove it. The fact that the will is attested by his servants and dependents is of course, no ground for holding it invalid, though that fact becomes material when there is a reasonable suspicion that the will is not the voluntary act of the testator and has been procured by the undue influence of members of his household. (3) Their Lordships had to consider such a case decided upon the following facts. One Sir Tharia Topan was a native of Zanzibar and owner of a larger mercantile business carried on in that Island. He was a khoja, and as such observed Hindu customs as regards his property. He was the father of 8 living children, 3 of whom were born of a previous marriage and 5 were of his living wife Janbai. He died in 1891 after executing a will and five codicils of which his widow applied for probate. His eldest son Musa contested the application alleging that the third and fourth codicils were obtained by the undue influence or coercion of Janbai and that the fifth codicil, if signed at all, was signed when he was unconscious. The plea of undue influence was supported on the ground that in 1889, when they were executed the testator was very infirm in health and almost blind, dependent upon Janbai who was a woman of superior abilities and great force of character; that she had acquired constantly increasing dominion over the testator's mind, and that she used it to obtain from him a constantly increasing amount of benefit for herself, which it is extremely improbable that he would have given her of his own accord. The third codicil empowered his executors to leave out all property which Janbai called her own and the fourth codicil conferred increased benefit upon her. The former codicil was prepared by a solicitor of the first rank in Bombay. The evidence showed that the wife was importunate and the husband made the third and fourth codicils to satisfy her. But the court held these facts insufficient to establish undue influence amounting to coercion. But their Lordships condemned the fifth codicil holding the executant not sufficiently conscious to understand the effect of the valuable bequests he was making to Janbai and her minor son aged 6. (1)

1803. What is then the degree of consciousness and intelligence that is sufficient to uphold the will of a dying man? "To constitute a good testamentary disposition the testator must retain a degree of understanding to comprehend what he is doing, to have a volition or power of choice: so that what he does really must be his own doing and not the doing of anybody else."

"The faculties in those two great divisions of the understanding and the will must still exist. They may have declined from their former comprehensiveness and vigour, they may be, and often are, on such occasions weakened, actually on the point of being extinguished; still though they may be as it were flickering in the socket, yet if they suffice to show the genuine and last behests of a rational creature, and a free agent, that is a good will in point of law. Wills are too frequently made by the sick and dying; the degree of understanding therefore which the law requires is such as may reasonably be expected from persons in that condition. It is not enough that the testator is able to answer familiar and usual questions. That has always been laid down. He must be able to exercise a competent understanding as to the general nature of the property, as to the state of his family, and as to the general condition and claims of the objects of his bounty, as to the nature of the instrument which he executes, and as to the general nature of the general objects and the provisions of which it contains; if he can do that, though he may be very feeble and debilitated in understanding, and be at the point of death, it is enough." (2)

1804. These observations were applied to the will of a person executed during his last illness which the court held had not been executed in a state of mind when he could deliberate upon its nature and character. (3) But in another case the Privy Council upheld the will of a moribund testator against whom all that was proved was that he was generally intemperate and at the time seriously ill and as to the charge of undue influence, all that was shown was that there was motive and opportunity for its exercise which in their Lordships' view was a ground for suspicion such as should justify the scrutiny with special care the evidence of those who propound the will. "But in order to set it aside there must be clear evidence that the undue influence was in fact exercised, or that the illness of the testator so affected his mental facilities as to make them unequal to the task of disposing of his property". (4) Such evidence was lacking in the case and the circumstances attending the making and execution of the will were not reasonably consistent with it.

1805 A will is not validated on the ground of its having been executed under pressure, unless the pressure was such as the testator could not resist. (5)

CONSTRUCTION OF GIFTS AND WILLS.

Construction of Indian deeds.

1806. Analogous Law.—There are two modes of construction favoured by law, viz., the literal and the benignant construction. The English law enacted in several sections of Chapter II of the Transfer of Property Act and of Part XII of the Succession Act favours the first method of interpretation which is natural owing to the advanced stage of English conveyancing and its phraseology adapted to the rules of interpretation which have become an integral part thereof but the same rule of literal construction cannot be extended to this country where the law of property is different and the art of conveyancing outside the Presidency towns practically unknown.

1807. The only rule possible for this informal mode of expression is that laid down by the Privy Council who said, "deeds and contracts of the people of India ought to be liberally construed. The form of expression, the literal sense, is not to be so much regarded as the real meaning of the parties which the transaction discloses".<sup>(1)</sup> This rule then Lordships have repeated in other cases<sup>(2)</sup> in one of which they emphatically called attention to the following passage in the judgment of Wilson, J which they approved. It is no new doctrine that rules established in English courts for construing "English documents are not as such applicable to transactions between natives of this country. Rules of construction are rules designed to assist in ascertaining intention and the applicability of many such rules depends upon the habits of thought and modes of expression prevalent amongst those to whose language they are applied. English rules of construction have grown up side by side with a very special law of property and a very artificial system of conveyancing and the success of those rules in giving effect to the real intention of those whose language they are used to interpret depends not more upon their original fitness for that purpose than upon the fact that English documents of a formal kind are ordinarily framed with a knowledge of the very rules of construction which are afterwards applied to them. It is a very serious thing to use such rules in interpreting the instruments of Hindus, who view most transactions from a different point, think differently and speak differently from Englishmen and who have never heard of the rules in question."<sup>(3)</sup>

1808. So in the Tagore case <sup>(1)</sup> it was said: "Another general principle applicable to transfers by gifts (more literally applied in the law of England to wills than to gifts inter vivos) is that a benignant construction is to be used and that if the real meaning of the document can be reasonably ascertained from the language used, though the language be ungrammatical or untechnical or mistaken as to name or description or in any other manner incorrect, provided it sufficiently indicate what was meant, that meaning shall be enforced and in the form which the law allows. Accordingly if the gift confers an estate describing the kind of inheritance, but showing that it was intended that he should have an estate of inheritance, the language would be read as conferring an estate inheritable as the law directs. If an estate were given to a man simply, without express words of inheritance, it would in the absence of a conflicting context, carry by Hindu Law (as under the present state of law it does by will in England) an estate of inheritance. If there were added to such a gift an imperfect description of it as a gift of inheritance, not excluding the inheritance imposed by the law, an estate of inheritance would pass. If again, the gift were in terms of an estate inheritable according to law, with superadded words restricting the power of transfer which the law annexes to that estate, the restriction would be rejected, as being repugnant, or, rather, as being an attempt to take away the power of transfer which the law attaches to the estate which the giver has sufficiently shown his intention to create, though he adds a qualification which the law does not recognize. If, on the other hand, the gift were to a man and his heirs, to be selected from a line other than that specified by law expressly excluding the legal course of inheritance, as for instance, if an estate were granted to a man and his eldest nephew and so forth for ever, to take as his heirs, to the exclusion of all other heirs, and without any power to dispose of the estate during his life-time, here inasmuch as an inheritance so described is not legal, such a gift cannot take effect except in favour of such persons as could take under a gift to the extent to which the gift is consistent with the law. The first taker would in this case take for his life-time, because the giver had at least that intention. He could not take more, because the language is inconsistent with his having any different inheritance from which the gift attempts to confer and that estate of inheritance which it confers, is void." <sup>(2)</sup>

entire interest.

185. A grant or bequest prima facie conveys the entire interest of the grantor unless it is limited expressly or by necessary implication.

accordance with the English rule, that every grant must be construed most strongly against the grantor as conveying all that he has not reserved by the words or necessary implication. (1)

1810. Analogous Law.—This section is based upon a decision of the Privy Council in a case since followed by the Indian Courts. (2) In that case one Har Narain a wealthy resident of Behar had filed a petition in the court of the Collector of Patna in which after reciting that he was entitled to and in possession of certain ancestral property and that as his wife, son, brother and brother's wife were all dead, mutation by names might be effected in favour of his son's widow Dhankuar and her two daughters except whom "none other is nor shall be my heir and malik . . . . Further more, to the said Dhankuar too these very two daughters named above, together with their children who after their marriage may be given in blessings to them by God Almighty, are and shall be heir and malik." Har Narain died in 1838 leaving him surviving his daughter-in-law Dhankuar and her daughter's son. In 1854 Dhankuar sold part of the lands mentioned in the mutation petition to one M for Rs. 41,000 of which Rs. 14,000 were devoted to pay off a mortgage thereon. The daughter's son sued both Dhankuar and the mortgagee for cancellation of the sale as not supported by legal necessity. The High Court decreed the claim upon terms against which both parties appealed to the Privy Council. It was contended for Dhankuar and the mortgagee that the bequest vested in her an absolute title but the other side contended that petition intended to devise only the ordinary estate of a Hindu widow; and this view was upheld by Sir Robert Collier who said: "In construing the will of a Hindu, it is not improper to take into consideration what are known to be the ordinary notions and wishes of Hindus with respect to the devolution of property. It may be assumed that a Hindu generally desires that an estate, especially an ancestral estate, shall be retained in his family; and it may be assumed that a Hindu knows that as a general rule at all events, women do not take absolute estates of inheritance which they are entitled to alienate. Having reference to these considerations together with the whole of the will all the expressions of which must be taken together without any one being insisted upon to the exclusion of others, their Lordships are of opinion that the two courts in India, who both substantially agree upon this point, are right in construing the intention of the testator to have been that the widow of his son should not take an absolute estate which she should have power to dispose of absolutely, but that she took an estate subject to her daughters succeeding her in that estate whether succeeding her as heirs of herself or succeeding her as heirs of the original testator is immaterial. It would appear that the testator used the word heir as signifying the person who is to take immediately in succession to another; that he applies it to the Rani as the person who is to take in immediate succession to him, and to the two daughters as the persons who are immediately to succeed to the Rani; and their Lordships think that, viewing the will as a whole, when he uses the expression except Mt. Rani Dhankuar aforesaid, none other is nor shall be my heir and malik, it may be fairly construed as meaning that she shall take a life-interest immediately succeeding him, without that interest being shared by her daughters or by any other person". (1)

1811. This case was followed by the Privy Council in another case in which the testator had bequeathed his estate to his daughters in a certain event. There were no words of limitation or enlargement. The will was drawn up in English by an English solicitor who attested it; but nevertheless the Privy Council construed it to convey to the daughters no more than a woman's estate in property. (2) The same view was taken in another case in which the testator had bequeathed the estate to his daughter-in-law simply with the words "I execute a will in favour of my daughter-in-law . . . who will remain in possession and enjoyment of all the property aforesaid like myself" words which were held to convey no interest in the property beyond that of possession and occupation. (3) But it is submitted that this construction does not give effect to the words "mist mere," as myself, which should have been held to convey at least a life-estate if not an absolute one as held in Calcutta (4) It is true that she had been given the power to nominate any one whom she may think fit as heir "so that the name of the family may continue." But these words are words of enlargement and do not have the effect of limiting the estate already devised. In such crude productions the testator himself has no clear idea of what he is conveying. If the testator himself could be brought back to construe his deed he would probably feel as puzzled as the courts who have at times to evolve a meaning out of meaningless jargon.

1812. The rule here enunciated of course, only applies where the deed is ambiguous and is not sufficiently explicit as to the quantum of interest conveyed to a female donee, since it is now established that the words which are sufficient to convey an absolute estate in favour of a male relation are insufficient to convey the same interest where the donee or devisee is a female.

1813. In some cases it has been held that the rules are only applicable when the donee is the wife, being inapplicable, where the donee is any other female relation, e.g., the mother, daughter or sister. (5) So in a case it was observed: "We cannot hold that, when their Lordships of the Judicial Committee speak of a general rule in connection with Hindus' knowledge that women do not take absolute estate of inheritance which they are able to alienate, they meant a rule of Hindu Law ; since we know that the rule of Hindu Law with regard to gifts to mothers and a daughters is the reverse." (1) But the Privy Council had formulated the rule in the case of a devise to the daughter-in-law (2) and the reason assigned is a reason equally applicable to all female devisees who by reason of their sex are ordinarily precluded from taking an absolute estate. It has been so held in several cases. (3) But a gift to a female for maintenance prima facie conveys only a limited estate. (4) And it may be that a gift to the wife or widow is presumably a provision for life. (5) And so in a case in which the testator had bequeathed his estate to his two wives declaring "that they, shall after my death, be heirs of all the moveable and immoveable properties . . . They shall have in every way, full power and all proprietary rights over all the moveable and immoveable properties" it was held that the intention of the deed was to convey to them as heirs in accordance with the ordinary rules of succession. (6) In another case the father gifted his estate to his daughter and her descendants for ever which was held convey an absolute estate. (7)

1814. At any rate these cases convey sufficient caution to an intending testator who desires to bequeath an absolute estate to his female relations. He must ex majore cautela use unequivocal expressions such as that the donee if given an absolute estate which she is free to possess as if she were a male.

1815. Absolute gift.—But since there is no set form for conveying an absolute title the same sense may be conveyed otherwise, as it was held to be in the following cases. The husband executed a deed of gift in favour of his younger wife in the following terms : "You are my youngest wife and your two sons are minors ; therefore for your charitable expenses I make a gift of the above taluq to you" The gift was held to be absolute. (8) In another case the wife was given the estate with the words that neither the donor nor his heirs should at any time have any claim to the property—which were held to constitute an-out-and-out gift. (9) So was the devise to the wife whom the husband had appointed as his executrix and heir providing that if a son be born to him that son should be the owner of the residue and if no son be born, then his wife should be the owner. (10)

1816. The same rule seems to control the construction of a devise to a daughter though in some cases the presumption is held as previously observed, erroneously, to be inapplicable to a daughter or in fact any female donee except the widow. (11) A gift of an acre of land to the daughter on account of pinmoney was held to convey an absolute estate.<sup>(1)</sup> Similarly where property was given to a married daughter having male issue the presumption that the gift only a conferred life-estate upon the donee was held to be inapplicable.<sup>(2)</sup>

1817. But in another case the father, the holder of an impartible Raj, made a gift of a village to his daughter on the occasion of her marriage, providing that the daughter should hold possession of it without the power of transfer and that on her death it should descend to her children, but that if she died childless the village should revert to the grantor. The daughter having died childless, the grantor's successor sued for resumption and the Privy Council held that resumption was justified under the terms of the grant which conferred an absolute estate defeasible on the failure of issue.<sup>(3)</sup> So where the testator after creating an endowment for religious worship in a pagoda directed that the shebaitship should be held by his wife and after his death by his son, and after his death "by my daughter and her husband Nundoo Lal Bose and their male children successively," the Privy Council held that the word "successively" to control the whole gift to the daughter, her husband and the male children and the intention was held to intend to give life-estates in the shebaitship to the sons of his daughter in succession.<sup>(4)</sup> In another case the testator who had no male issue bequeathed certain real property to his eldest daughter and her sons from generation to generation. The legatee who had daughters predeceased the testator who then also died, leaving a widow and other daughters him surviving. The daughters of the deceased legatee claimed the property as the lineal descendants of the testator, contending that although S. 96 of the Indian Succession Act did not apply to the case it should be held to govern it by analogy as affording a guide to justice, equity and good conscience. It was held that English rule embodied in the Succession Act providing that on a gift to the testator's child, the legacy did not lapse on the legatee dying before the testator leaving lineal descendants, could not be extended by analogy to Hindu Law and that on the legatee predeceasing the testator the gift failed altogether.<sup>(5)</sup>

1818. The question whether a gift made to two or more co-parceners jointly conveys to them a joint or separate interest—a joint tenancy or a tenancy-in-common—has been considered in some cases.<sup>(6)</sup> But the question seems to be one of intention<sup>(7)</sup> in the absence of which the donees would take as tenants-in-common and not as joint tenants with a right of survivorship inter se.<sup>(8)</sup> But a gift to two or more persons without indicating an intention that they were to take as tenants-in-common constitutes a joint tenancy. But this is as pointed out by the Privy Council<sup>(9)</sup> an extremely<sup>(10)</sup> technical rule of conveyancing which cannot be extended to Hindu Law as it has been (it is submitted, erroneously) in some cases.<sup>(11)</sup>

1819. The donor's intention must be gathered primarily from the deed of gift construed with reference to the rule of construction adopted in the personal law to which the parties may be subject. Where, for instance, the testator (a Parsi) bequeathed his property to his widow and daughters directing "that the donees were to agree together and to manage the affairs with unanimity after whom his daughter's two sons were the owners of whatever property and estate there may be belonging to me," Fulton, J., held it to constitute a tenancy-in-common, but on appeal this view was overruled, the court applying the English rule of construction applicable to the Parsis and holding that the gift was a joint gift to the two sons. Farran, C. J., observing: "Speaking as a grammarian I apprehend that a simple gift to A and B is a joint gift, that is to say, for the purpose of the gift the two are treated one person. The idea is made more clear when a gift is to a class as for example to the inhabitants of a parish is assumed. If a gift is made in that form, no one would, I imagine, suggest that it was a gift to each of the inhabitants of a proportionate share in the bequest. They are all considered as a unit for the purpose of accepting the gift. The Roman jurists adopted the same view." (1) This case was, of course, expressly decided with reference to the English law. But if in the same case the donor were a Hindu, the sons would have taken as tenants-in-common.

1820. A donatio mortis causa is an example of a conditional gift dependent upon the death of the donor. Hindu Law makes no distinction between this and any other condition. (2) Where for instance, the donor delivered certain Government promissory notes to the plaintiff in contemplation of death a few months after which he died whereupon the plaintiff sued his heirs for completion of his title by endorsement, the court decreed the claim holding that the donee's title was complete on delivery, whereas in the same case the donee's title under English law would not have been complete until his death. (3) The difference between the English law and the Hindu Law is then this: that while under the one property in the donatio mortis causa does not pass until death of the donor, property under the other passes with delivery, subject to the conditional right of resumption. The fact that the donor did not make the endorsement was held not to affect the validity of the gift. The same view was taken by Peacock, C. J., in another case in which he said, "A transfer by deed and delivery, in my opinion, in the case of Europeans, constitutes the relationship of trustee and cestui que trust even in favour of a volunteer. In this case, the delivery without a transfer by deed was as valid between Hindus as if there had been a conveyance by deed and a delivery. The notes, therefore, in my opinion passed to the donee." (4)

1821. Analogous Law.—"The power of parting with property once acquired, so as to confer the same property upon another, must take effect, either by inheritance or transfer each according to law. Inheritance does not depend upon the will of the individual owner: transfer does. Inheritance is a rule laid down (or, in the case of custom, recognized) by the state, not merely for the benefit of the individuals, but for reasons of public policy. (1) It follows directly from this that a private individual who attempts by gift or will to make property inheritable otherwise than as the law directs, is assuming to legislate and that the gift must fail and the inheritance take place as the law directs." (2) As Turner, L. J., put it: "A man cannot create a new form of estate, or alter the line of succession allowed by law for the purpose of carrying out his own wishes or views of policy." (3) Quoting this passage in another case Willes, J., added: "If the gift were to a man and his heirs, to be selected from a line other than that specified by law expressly excluding the legal course of inheritance, as for instance, if an estate were granted to a man and his eldest nephew and the eldest nephew of such eldest nephew and so forth for ever, to take as his heirs to the exclusion of other heirs, and without any of the persons so taking having the power to dispose of the estate during his life-time, here inasmuch as an inheritance so described is not legal, such a gift cannot take effect, except in favour of such persons, as could take under a gift to the extent to which the gift is consistent with the law. The first taker would in this case, take for his life-time, because the giver had at least that intention. He could not take more, because the language is inconsistent with his having any different inheritance from that which the gift attempted to confer, and that state of inheritance which it confers is void."

"It follows that all estates of inheritance created by gift or will, so far as they are inconsistent with the general law of inheritance, are void as such and that by Hindu Law no person can succeed thereunder as heir to an estate described in the terms which in English law would designate an estate in tail." (4)

The Tagore case was an attempt to create an estate in tail male, and the Privy Council held the tail void, upholding only the life-estate to the immediate grantee.

1822. Analogous Law.—This section is the very antithesis of S. 15 of the Transfer of Property Act and of S. 102 of the Succession which lay down the contrary rule founded on the English rule enunciated in the leading case of Leake v. Robinson.<sup>(1)</sup> The two rules radically differ in that the one construes a grant benignantly, the other literally. A concrete example will best illustrate the difference. Suppose a fund is bequeathed to A for life and after his death to all his children who shall attain the age of 25. A survives the testator and has some children (say B, C and D) living at the testator's death. Now B, C and D living at the testator's death must attain the age of 25 (if at all) within the limits allowed for a bequest, which is 18 years after the death of the testator.<sup>(2)</sup> But since A may have children after the testator's decease, some of whom may not attain the age of 25 until more than 18 years have elapsed after the decease of A, it follows that if the bequest is to be construed literally as benefiting all A's children on attaining the age of 25, and as all cannot take, it follows that B, C and D cannot take also, that is to say, as the bequest is given to all A's children as a class, it is not good as to any division of that class, but is wholly void.<sup>(3)</sup>

1823. But there is another view. The bequest might be construed benignantly, giving effect to it as far as possible. In that case B, C and D will take though all A's children may not be able to profit by the testator's bounty. This is the Indian rule and adopted as a canon of construction applicable to Hindu gifts and bequests.<sup>(4)</sup> The rule was thus stated by Wilson, J., in a case<sup>(5)</sup> which in the words of the Privy Council has "set at rest for all practical purposes" the conflict of judicial opinion in India.<sup>(6)</sup> In that case one Radha Kristo had on the 27th January 1871 executed a deed of gift conveying certain plots of land to two of his grandsons by name Ramlal and Shamlal and to their brothers who might be subsequently born providing "that the two now existing brothers and their uterine brothers, who shall be born in future, will divide the same in equal shares according to the terms of this deed of gift." Possession was given to the two existing donees. Radha Kristo died on the 21st February 1875. Two other grandsons being subsequently born sued Ramlal and Shamlal for their share on the ground that their grandfather's gift being a gift to a class some of whom were incapable of taking being not in existence at the date of the gift, was wholly void and that the property therefore remained with Radha Kristo till his death and passed to his heirs. The defence was that the gift to the two defendants was a valid one though the deed intended also to benefit others who were not then in existence and therefore as to them, it was void. This contention was upheld by the Trial Judge but on appeal, Wilson, J., (Garth, C. J., concurring) dismissed the suit holding that the English rule of construction followed in some cases<sup>(7)</sup> had been discounted by the Privy Council<sup>(8)</sup> and that they could not appropriately be referred to as guides in the construction of deeds executed by Hindus, for which the true rule was "to ascertain the real meaning of the parties to the transaction; that when that meaning has been ascertained if it appears that the whole plan cannot be carried out but a part of it can, effect is to be given to that part. And that, accordingly, if the plan be to give a present gift to persons capable of taking, that gift is effectual, although it was intended that other persons incapable of taking should afterwards come in to share in the gift." (1) Then adverting to the deed in suit he said, "There seems to me no great difficulty in ascertaining what the donor intended. I shall first try to state what that intention seems to me to be, without the use of technical words, and in popular language, a course which seems to me the safer course in dealing with the intention of a Hindu gentleman. He intended, I think, that he should at once cease to have himself any interest in the property given; that the two living grandsons should at once enter upon the possession and enjoyment of it; that if brothers should afterwards be born, each of such brothers should at his birth step into an equal share of the property, but without any retrospective effect; and that no act of the living grandsons should prejudice this right of their after-born brothers. . . . (2) and that during the minority of the living grandsons they should manage the property for their benefit without being liable to account to them. Expressing this in more technical language I think he meant to give to the two living grandsons, present title to and the present possession and enjoyment of the property but that their title was liable to be partially divested in favour of after-born brothers." (3)

1824. In the Privy Council case which Wilson, J., followed, the grandfather had with the consent of his son made a gift of his property constituting his grandson and his own brothers who might be born thereafter permanent and rightful owners of the properties. The son's creditor attached some of these properties and the grandson successfully objected to the attachment, whereupon the creditor sued him for a declaration that the gift was fraudulent and void as being a gift to unborn persons. Their Lordships held that two constructions were possible, one contended for by the creditor that all the grandsons were the objects of his bounty and that as all could not take none could take, and that the donor's intention should be given effect to so far as it was possible and their Lordships preferred the latter construction as more consonant with the donor's intention. (4) In such case the donor may be said to express a primary and a secondary intention. His primary intention is to benefit all, but if this cannot be attained he still wishes to benefit those whom he can. Of course if the class is to be ascertained on the death of the testator no question of remoteness can arise, and the general rule is that the gift takes effect in favour of such of the class as are then capable of taking. If the ascertainment of the class is deferred to a later date, those who become members of the class within the extended period are admitted and subject to any question of remoteness, those who are thus capable of taking because born after the date of ascertainment they are simply excluded and the rest take the whole; and this is so even if the gift be to persons born and to be born. (5) If any die in the testator's life-time, they are simply excluded and the rest take the whole. (1) If the gift to one is revoked by a codicil, he is simply excluded and the rest take the whole. (2) If one is incapacitated from taking because he has attested the will, he is simply excluded, and the rest take the whole. (3) So far the English and Indian rules coincide.

1825. But as in England there are rules of law guarding against remoteness, enacted in S. 15 of the Transfer of Property Act and S. 102 of the Succession Act which enact that a gift or devise cannot be made which is to vest more than 18 years after the close of a life or lives in being and it is at this point and with reference to this law that the English and the Indian rules differ. Under the English law enacted in the two sections last named, the rule is to the effect that when a gift is given to a class in such terms that the ascertaining of the class and the vesting of the gift are or may be deferred beyond the period allowed by law, the gift is wholly void and cannot be made effectual for such members of the class as might be ascertainable earlier. That is the whole of the rule. It is a rider upon the law of remoteness and is only applicable to a gift to a class tainted with the vice of remoteness.

1826. As it is, this rule though enacted as a part of the statute law, is wholly inapplicable to Hindus whose deeds should be construed in accordance with the principle enunciated in the section which is supported by the authority of the Privy Council (4) and a large number of other cases. (5)

1827. Moreover, the English rule only applies to a gift to a class, viz., to a body of persons uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time, the share of each being dependent for its amount upon the ultimate number of persons. (6) Where therefore, the gift is to a persona designata or to a class to each of whose members a distinct and independent right is given there is no difficulty of construction, as each takes in his own right and not as a member of a class. (7)

1828. On the other hand where the intention is to benefit a class as a whole and not any of its individuals then the latter cannot take apart from the class. (8) So a gift or devise to "sons of sons" and "daughters of sons" or "widows of sons" is a gift to a class and not to any of its members. Consequently if any member falling into that class was not formed within 18 years after the testator's death the bequest would be void altogether. (9)

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing principle its construction is subject to the rules set out in Ss. 61-77, 82, 83, 85, 88—98 of the Succession Act, and principally these set out in the next following Ss. 190-200.

1829. Analogous Law.—It has again and again been emphasized that Hindu wills must not be construed with reference to the technical rules applicable to the construction of English wills. All that this means is that the rules founded on a different system of tenure and applicable to a society with different habits of thought cannot be extended to the construction of the wills of a people wholly differing from them no less in their religion, ideas and thought than in their social system and the laws of property. But apart from these technical rules of construction, there are those which are equally applicable to both.

1830. Such are, for example, the rules which exempt the language of wills from all technical restraint entitling them to a benignant construction, but nevertheless not wholly abandoned to the license of construction, leaving the intention to be collected upon arbitrary notions, as paramount to the authority of precedents and principles.

1831. Whenever therefore, the courts speak of the intention as the governing principle, what they mean is that the construction though free from technical rules must yet be upon grounds of a judicial nature, as distinguished from arbitrary occasional conjecture. (1)

1832. To a certain extent the grounds are common to all systems. For example both under English as under the Hindu Law rules stated in the several clauses are equally good. It is only when the general rules are to be applied to the interpretation of a Hindu will that the special rules of English law have to be eschewed and those of Hindu Law kept in view.

1833. The two sets of rules will now be examined.

1834. Succession Act, Ss. 61-98.—Sections 61-77, 82, 83, 85, 88, 89, 90, 98 of the Succession Act have been extended by the Cl. (1). Hindu Wills Act subject to its provisions. These rules being however consonant with justice, equity and good conscience have been held to have a wider application as guides to the construction of other wills not technically subject to the statute law. (2)

1835. Of these, S. 62 states that it is not necessary that any technical words or terms of art shall be used in a will, but only that the wording shall be such that the intention of the testator can be known therefrom. This is entirely in accord with the Hindu Law under which a will if reduced to writing might be made in any language, form or order, the only pre-requisite being a sufficient expression of intention, since the intention is to be judged by the expressions used and their general tenor and effect. For this purpose oral evidence is admissible for the purpose and within the limits prescribed in Ss. 64-66, 67 and 68.

1836. A will is presumed to speak from the moment of the testator's death. Consequently, the description contained in a will of property the subject of a gift shall, unless a contrary intention appears in the will, be deemed to refer to and comprise property answering that description at the death of the testator. <sup>(1)</sup>

1837. General words may be understood in a restricted sense where it may be collected from the will that the testator meant to use them in a restricted sense; and words may be used in a wider sense than that which they usually bear, where it may be collected from the other words of the will that the testator meant to use them in such wider sense. <sup>(2)</sup> Where a clause is susceptible of two meanings according to one of which it has some effect and according to the other it can have none, the former is to be preferred. <sup>(3)</sup> If the same words occur in different parts of the same will, they must be taken to have been used everywhere in the same sense unless there appears an intention to the contrary. <sup>(4)</sup> But no part of a will is to be rejected as destitute of meaning if it is possible to put a reasonable consideration upon it. <sup>(5)</sup> The meaning of any clause in a will is to be collected from the entire instrument and all its parts are to be construed with reference to each other and for the purpose a codicil is to be considered as part of the will. <sup>(6)</sup>

1838. Where a will is contained in two or more documents they must be read together as a single deed and it is legitimate to look at a contemporaneous document referred to in the will which the testator caused to be written with the express intent to render clear his wishes with regard to his succession. <sup>(7)</sup> In construing a will, a court must consider the surrounding circumstances, the position of the testator, the family relationship, the particular sense and many other things including the race and religious opinions of the testator and influence, and aims arising therefrom—but all this solely as an aid to ascertaining the meaning of the language used by the probability that he would use words in a particular sense in the particular will. Once the construction is settled, the duty of the court is loyally to carry out the intentions as expressed and none other. This duty is universal and is true alike of wills of every nationality and every religion or rank of life. The court is in no case justified in adding to testamentary dispositions. If they transgress any legal restrictions they must be disregarded. If any eventuality arises which the will leaves unprovided for there will be intestacy. <sup>(8)</sup> For the purpose of determining questions as to what person or what property is denoted by any words used in a will a court must inquire into every material fact relating to the persons who claim to be interested under such will, the property which is claimed as the subject of disposition, the circumstances of the testator and his family, and into every fact a knowledge of which may conduce to the right application of the words which the testator has used. (1) Where the words used in a will to designate or describe a legatee or a class of legatees sufficiently show what is meant, an error in the name or description shall not prevent the legacy from taking effect. A mistake in the name of a legatee may be corrected by a description of him, and a mistake in the description of a legatee may be corrected by the name. (2) Where any word material to the full expression of the meaning has been omitted it may be supplied by the context. (3) Where the words of the will are unambiguous, but it is found by extrinsic evidence that they admit of applications, one only of which can have been intended by the testator, extrinsic evidence may be taken to show which of these applications was intended. (4)

1839. But where there is no ambiguity or deficiency on the facts of the will no extrinsic evidence as to the intention of the testator shall be admitted (5).

Where two clauses or gifts in a will are irreconcilable so that they cannot possibly stand together, the last shall prevail. (6) In this respect a will differs from a deed in which, of two repugnant clauses, the first prevails. This rule is, of course, not to be resorted to in case of inconsistency in the same provision (7) nor where different subjects are referred to (8) and in all cases only when reconciliation is impossible. (9)

1840. A will or bequest not expressive of any definite intention is void for uncertainty. (10) This section is incorporated in the code and its scope will be separately discussed.

1841. Quantum of bequest.—Ss. 82-98 deal with the quantum of bequests. Of these Ss. 84, 86 and 87 do not apply to Hindu wills. S. 82 lays down the rule that where property is bequeathed to any person he is entitled to the testator's interest therein, unless it appears from the will that only a restricted interest was intended for him. (11) Where property is bequeathed to a person with a bequest in the alternative to another person or to a class of persons, if a contrary intention does not appear by the will, the legatee first named shall be entitled to the legacy if he be alive at the time when it takes effect; but if he be then dead, the person or class of persons named in the second branch of the alternative shall take the legacy. (12)

Where a bequest is made to a class of persons under a general description only, no one to whom the words of the description are not in their ordinary sense applicable shall take the legacy. (13)

1842. Where a will purports to make two bequests to the same person, and a question arises whether the testator intended to make the second bequest instead of or in addition to the first, if there is nothing in the will to show what he intended, the following rules shall prevail in determining the construction to be put upon the will.

1843. Where a will purports to make two bequests to the same person and a question arises whether the testator intended to make the second bequest instead of or in addition to the first, if there is nothing in the will to show what he intended, the following rules shall prevail in determining the construction to be put upon the will:—

First.—If the same specific thing is bequeathed twice to the same legatee in the same will or in the will and again in the codicil, he is entitled to receive that specific thing only.

Second.—Where one and the same will or one and the same codicil purports to make, in two places, the bequest to the same person of the same quantity or amount of anything, he shall be entitled to one such legacy only.

Third.—Where two legacies of unequal amount are given to the same person in the same will or in the same codicil, the legatee is entitled to both.

Fourth.—Where two legacies whether equal or unequal in amount are given to the same legatee one by a will and the other by a codicil or each by a different codicil, the legatee is entitled to both legacies.

Explanation.—In the last four rules the word “will” does not include a codicil. (1) A residuary legatee may be constituted by any words that show an intention on the part of the testator that the person designated shall take the surplus or residue of his property. (2) Under a residuary bequest the legatee is entitled to all property belonging to the testator at the time of his death of which he has not made any other testamentary disposition which is capable of taking effect. (3)

1844. If a legacy be given in general terms without specifying the time when it is to be paid, the legatee has a vested interest in it from the day of the death of the testator and if he die without having received it, it shall pass to his representative. (4) If the legatee does not survive the testator the legacy cannot take effect, but shall lapse and form part of the residue of the testator's property, unless it appear by the will that the testator intended that it should go to some other person.

1845. In order to entitle the representatives of the legatee to receive the legacy it must be proved that he survived the testator. (5) If a legacy be given to two persons jointly and one of them die before the testator, the other legatee takes the whole. (6) But where a legacy is given to legatees in words which show that the testator intended give them distinct shares of it, then if any legatee die before the testator, so much of the legacy as was intended for him shall fall into the residue of the testator's property. (7) Where the share that lapses is a part of the general residue bequeathed by the will, that share shall go as undisposed of. (8) Where a bequest shall have been made to any child or other lineal descendant of the testator, and the legatee shall die in the life-time of the testator but any lineal descendant of his shall survive the testator the bequest shall not lapse, but shall take effect as if the death of the legatee had happened immediately after the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will. (1) Where a bequest is made to one person for the benefit of another, the legacy does not lapse by the death in the testator's life-time, of the persons to whom the bequest is made. (2) Where a bequest is made simply to a described class of persons the thing bequeathed shall go only to such as shall be alive at the testator's death.

Exception.—If property is bequeathed to a class of persons described as standing in a particular degree of kindred to a specified individual, but their possession of it is deferred until a time later than the death of the testator by reason of a prior bequest or otherwise, the property shall at that time go to such of them as shall be then alive and to the representative of any of them who have died since the death of the testator. (3)

1846. Charitable bequests.—Both the English and Indian rules of construction permit a latitude of construction in giving effect to the testator's religious or charitable bequests which if made to an individual would be unquestionably void. Charitable bequests are no exception to the rule that a benignant construction must be placed upon wills and charitable bequests. (4) In ascertaining whether or not a general intention to make a bequest to a public charity is expressed with definiteness the test to be applied is, whether a man of ordinary common sense wishing to follow the directions of the testator with a willing mind will have any practical difficulty in giving effect to the bequest. So where the testator directed his brothers to start a "Sadavari" for the needy in his name and the bequest was opposed as void for uncertainty though it was admitted that "Sadavari" meant charity which took the form of a periodical distribution at regular intervals of money and goods the court held the bequest good on the ground that the testator had expressed his general intention to give a legacy to charitable purpose and he only left uncertain the particular mode by which his intention was to be carried into effect. In such a case the trustees or, failing them, the court could draw up a scheme giving effect to the testator's general intention. (5)

1847. The principle of Hindu Law which invalidates a gift other than to a sentient being capable of accepting it (6) does not apply to a bequest to trustees for the establishment of an image and the worship of a Hindu deity after the testator's death, and does not make such a bequest void. (7)

So a direction to establish a Thakur at a place to be selected by the executors has been upheld, (8) as was the direction that the executors should get a Shiva's temple erected at a reasonable cost in a suitable place within the compound of the brick built baithak khana house inclusive of the building and garden thereof. (1) So are bequests to build a well and avada or cistern for animals to drink out of (2) or for the performance of Shradha and the giving of feasts to Brahmins. (8) So was a bequest for the worship of Saiv Thakur (4) and Dharam Sabha with a power to the executor to receive the surplus income after defraying expenses but with no power to alienate the property. (5) So again was a direction to executors and trustees to "pay to my sons or their heirs and representatives such sums for the Seva or service of my family idols, and the usual Pujas that are celebrated in my house and the periodical Shradha of my ancestors of my late wife and of myself when dead, as to the executors and trustees may seem fit and proper." (6) A bequest to a charitable object to be selected by the executor is of course a valid charitable bequest since its object is certain, in that it is capable of being made certain by the executor. (7)

1848. Void for uncertainty.—But the case was held different where the executor was to apply a bequest for "such charitable uses or for such emigration uses" (8) or "to charitable or other indefinite uses." (9) Such will be a bequest for "Sara Kam" or good works (10) or "for purposes of popular usefulness or for purposes of charity" as the executors, may, in their plenary discretion select (11) or any similar vague purpose which the executor might select to spend the same, "in proper and just acts for the testator's benefit." (12)

1849. Such is a bequest to "Dharm" a vague expression connoting "virtue," legal or moral duty and law. A bequest to "Dharm" simpliciter or when coupled with equally vague explanations such as "Dharm or doing all good acts of a permanent nature and acting in such a manner as to give me a good name," (13) such and similar bequests are void both because of vagueness as because their object can only be attained by the creation of a trust which cannot be administered effectively. (14)

one should keep in view is to ascertain the testator's real intention. He must take his seat in the testator's easy chair and with the unfolded will upon his lap think his thoughts for the moment. But in doing so he must not take leave of the actual words used by the departed occupant of that chair. For it is his duty to interpret not in the light of intention nor by a flight of imagination but by the stern realities of the written will. (1) As Turner, L. J., said: "In determining that construction, what we must look to, is the intention of the testator. The Hindu Law no less than the English law points to the intention as the element by which we are to be guided in determining the effect of a testamentary disposition; nor, so far as we are aware, is there any difference between the one law and the other as to the materials from which the intention is to be collected. Primarily the words of the will are to be considered. They convey the expression of the testator's wishes but the meaning to be attached to them may be affected by surrounding circumstances, and where this is the case those circumstances no doubt must be regarded. Amongst the circumstances thus to be regarded, is the law of the country under which the will is made, and its dispositions are to be carried out. If that law has attached to particular words a particular meaning, or to a particular disposition a particular effect, it must be assumed that the testator, in the dispositions which he has made, had regard to that meaning or to that effect unless the language of the will or the surrounding circumstances displace that assumption." (1) "To put the matter another way, the question is, not what the testator intended to do but what he did mean by the words which he actually used. The true enquiry is not what a testator meant to express; but what the words used do express; extrinsic evidence cannot be received as evidence of a testator's intention outside and independent of the written words employed by him. In other words, where the meaning is fairly certain, it cannot be allowed to be modified by speculative inferences drawn from his conduct, as to what he intended to do or thought he had done; extrinsic evidence, when admissible, is used as an aid to the correct interpretation of the language of the will; but it cannot be relied upon for misconstruing the will." (2)

1851. The admissibility of oral evidence affecting the terms of a will is subject to the provisions of Chapter VI (Ss. 91-100) of the Evidence Act, S. 109 of which however provides that nothing in that chapter shall be taken to affect any of the provisions of the Indian Succession Act as to the construction of wills. Now, since these provisions have been extended to the wills of Hindus subject to the provisions of the Hindu Wills Act it follows that Hindu wills made under that Act are subject to the rules of construction enacted in the Succession Act and Chapter VI of the Evidence Act so far as its provisions do not "affect" those of the Succession Act. But since the Hindu Wills Act does not apply to the mofussil outside Bengal, it follows that their construction is subject to the Evidence Act unaffected by the Succession Act. In other words, a Hindu will is subject to two different modes of construction according as it is or is not subject to the Hindu Wills Act.

191. The surrounding circumstances under which the deviser made his will, as the state of his property, of his family and the like is admissible.

(1) Soorjeemoney v. Denobundoo, 6 M. I. A. 526 (550, 551).

(2) Srinibash v. Monmohini, 8 C. L. J. 224 (254).

1852. There is no radical contrariety between the two sets of rules. And generally speaking, the rule stated in the section applies equally to all wills whether those made by a Hindu or non-Hindu, and whether or not subject to the Succession Act. Extrinsic evidence is admissible to prove intention to make, alter or revoke, to ascertain the person named in the will, to ascertain the thing bequeathed—that is to ascertain the subject and the object—to ascertain whether a codicil is cumulative or substituted, and other similar matters which do not contradict, add to or detract from its terms.

Construction of will.

192. A will must be liberally and not too literally construed.

Synopsis.

- (1) Benignant construction (1853). intention of testator (1854).
 (2) Construction so as to effectuate

1853. Benignant construction.—It is again a general rule applicable alike to English and Hindu Law, that a will must be benignantly construed, the testator's intention being carried out, if ascertainable, to the extent and in the form which the law allows. (1) "To construe one will by reference to expressions of more or less doubtful import to be found in other wills is for the most part an unprofitable exercise. Happily that method of interpretation has gone out of fashion in this country. To search and sift the heaps of cases on wills which encumber our English law reports in order to understand and interpret wills of people speaking a different tongue, trained in different habits of thought, and brought up under different conditions of life seems almost absurd. In the Subordinate Courts of India such a practice, if permitted, would encourage litigation and lead to idle and endless arguments." (2)

1854. The language of the will to be construed must be the best guide to its interpretation. It must be read as a whole and its paramount purpose ascertained. If all its clauses are interdependent but consistent then effect must be given to them all; but if some of them are inconsistent, then the inconsistencies must, if possible, be reconciled and effect given to such of them as are reconcilable. It may be that the two clauses though appearing to be antagonistic are intended to provide for different circumstances. Such was the will of which the 8th, 13th, and 18th clauses were seemingly antagonistic in that they left uncertain whether the interest conveyed to the two sons of the testator was absolute or limited. The High Court held them to convey only a limited estate since there was a gift over which precluded the possibility of an absolute devise; but on appeal, the Privy Council reversed their decree holding that the limitation over was not intended to limit the son's estate but to provide for a contingency. (3) So a gift under a will to certain persons and their heirs for ever, of certain annuities being fixed portions of the nett profits of an estate, was held to amount to a gift of proportionate shares in the corpus of the estate, in the absence of a conflict of such an interpretation with the general intention as gathered from the whole will. 193. Where a specific charitable bequest fails for uncertainty in the object and there is no direction, upon its failure that the bequest should go to the residue, the court will apply the gift cypres, that is to say, to other objects as nearly as may be of a similar character.

1855. Analogous Law.—In the first place the Cypres doctrine only applies to religious and charitable bequests. It has no application to bequests generally. (1) In the second place the doctrine has no application even as regards charitable bequests, where there is a direction that on failure of a bequest the property shall fall into residue, or where the objects of the original trusts are capable of being carried into effect, but remain unsatisfied or where the original trusts are still subsisting. As the Privy Council observed, “The jurisdiction of the court to act on the Cypres doctrine upon the failure of a specific charitable bequest, arises whether the residue be given to charity or not, unless upon the construction of the will, a direction can be implied that the bequest, if it fails should go to the residue.” (2) This passage occurs in a case in which the testator had made a bequest for the discharge and relief of poor debtors detained in prison in Calcutta which having failed by reason of the abolition of imprisonment for debt, the Privy Council held that the gift was capable of being applied cypres notwithstanding that the residuary bequest was to charity; that upon the construction of the will, there was not such a necessary inference of intention to be found in the terms and provisions of the will as to raise the implication of a bequest over by the testator of these legacies upon the failure of the particular charities and that the appellant was not competent under his present petition, which was confined to the claim of a share of the residue as residuary legatee, to re-open the scheme, which had been settled and confirmed by the High court, for the Cypres application of the fund in dispute, on the ground that the appellant was excluded from participation therein. (3)

1856. The doctrine of Cypres as applied to charities rests on the view that charity in the abstract is the substance of the gift and the particular disposition merely the mode, so that in the eye of the court, the gift, notwithstanding the particular disposition may not be capable of execution, subsists as a legacy which never fails and cannot lapse. It cannot be laid down as a general principle that the Cypres doctrine is displaced where the residuary bequest is to a charity, or that among charities there is anything analogous to the benefit of survivorship, since cases may easily be supposed where the scope of the charitable object is such or requires so small an amount to satisfy it, that it would be absurd to allow a large fund bequeathed to a particular charity to fall into it.

1857. On the failure of a specific charitable bequest, jurisdiction arises to act on the Cypres doctrine, whether the residue be given in charity or not, unless upon the construction of the will a direction can be implied that the bequest if it fails, should go to the residue.

In applying the Cypres doctrine, regard may be had to the other objects of the testator's bounty, but primary consideration is to be given to the gift which has failed, and to a search for objects akin to it. The relief of misery in a particular locality may guide the court in framing a Cypres scheme to benefit that locality. Unless the Cypres scheme framed by the Lower Court be plainly wrong, a court of appeal should not interfere with it. (1)

1858. A testator had by his will directed his executors to set apart a sum of Rs. 16,000 for a charitable dispensary and Rs. 50,000 for its upkeep. He directed his executors to demarcate a portion of his garden house at Ramkristipur for the erection of the dispensary. By the partition of the garden house the land was not available for the dispensary. The executors were all dead. But the court held the Cypres doctrine to apply and gave directions for carrying out the charity with the money and the accumulated interest thereon. (2)

1859. Charitable bequest.—The essential characteristic of a charitable bequest is that it must be for the benefit of the public or mankind. A bequest to a poor relation or friend by name is howmuch soever charitable in intention and in fact, is not a charitable bequest in law. In this respect there is no distinction between the English and the Indian view of the subject. So in an old English case charity is defined as a "gift to a general public use which extends to the poor as well as to the rich." (3) The difficulty of attempting an exhaustive enumeration of objects which constitute charity is obvious and admitted. (4) But it is not difficult to understand what charity means. The difficulty arises when it is diverted from its public purpose and becomes what is sometimes called, "a private charity" which however, is only a charity in the legal sense when it is at least a charity restricted to a special class or administered by individuals without the intervention of any corporate organisation. (5) "Each particular object may be private but it is the extensiveness which will constitute it a public charity." (6)

1860. Subject certain and uncertain.—The subject of a charitable bequest must be reasonably certain, that is, it must be ascertainable with a reasonable degree of certainty as to what property the founder has dedicated or set apart for charity. There is this difference between a secular and a charitable bequest that if the testator has supplied a measure of the bequest, the court will ascertain how much should be applied and will settle a scheme.

1861. The subject is, however, not uncertain where the testator devises the remainder over after a succession of life estates to charity. (1) So he may devise the income of a certain field or fund, the rent of certain properties, (2) half his income (8) or a sum of money (4) specified or unspecified, provided its amount can be estimated. Such was the bequest to "get a Shiva's temple erected at a reasonable cost in a suitable place" which the court fixed at Rs. 2,843-10-6 being 3 per cent of the value of the moveable property left by him. (5)

1862. Not void.—It has already been stated that a bequest may be void because its subject or object is uncertain (§ 1848). It has also been seen that a somewhat different rule prevails as regards the construction of bequests the object of which is charity and that a bequest may be upheld if made to charity, though it would be void if made for a secular purpose.

The courts have accordingly upheld bequests for performing the testator's funeral ceremonies and for feeding Brahmins according to the custom of the caste (6) or for feeding and paying Brahmins on the day following the Shivratri festival (7) or for feeding indigent men at the outer gate of his house. (8) So where a gift was made to the inmates of a hospital, it was held that the gift was in reality for the proper management and use of the hospital. Gifts to charitable institutions are valid and upheld even though the institution be not a corporate body provided there is some responsible authority charged with the general administration of the funds of the institution. (9) So a bequest to an Anna Chatra, (10) and for a Sadavart for the needy have been upheld. (11) A Sadavart is a periodical distribution of food, money, cloth or goods. It is a well known form of charity the scheme of which can be easily settled. As such it cannot be held void for vagueness. Such is the bequest of the residue to such religious and charitable purposes as the trustees may think proper (12) though on this point the contrary is also maintained. (13)

1863. As compared to this the following are more certain, e.g. settlement of Rs. 500 a month for continuance of the charity at the testator's Dharmshala at Benares, (14) or for the construction of a temple to Shiv within the compound of a specified house. (15) In fact it is now settled that a bequest to a named deity is valid (16) even though its image or temple be non-existent at the testator's death; or if existent, was mutilated or destroyed since the image is but a symbol of the deity and may be renewed again and again. (1) So a bequest to establish an idol at such place as the executor shall think fit is valid. (2) So is also one for the performance of Durga and Laxmi Pujas to be carried out in the manner indicated by the testator. (3)

1864. Void for uncertainty.—But with all the liberality of construction the object may at times be wholly unascertainable. Whenever it is so the court has to consider whether the bequest wholly fails or may be upheld cypres. A bequest to Dharm has been held by the Privy Council to be wholly void. (4) The same view had been previously held here. (5) Such are also bequests to Sarakam or “good works” (6) or to “purposes of popular usefulness or charity” (7) since a charitable bequest is mixed up with “popular” or “useful” “purposes.” It has been held that where charitable purposes are mixed up with other purposes of such a shadowy and indefinite nature that the court cannot execute them, such as “charitable or benevolent,” (8) or “charitable or philanthropic” or “charitable or pious” purposes, or where the description includes purposes which may or may not be charitable such as undertakings of public utility and a discretion is vested in the trustees, the whole gift fails for uncertainty. (9)

1865. Such would be a bequest to an unnamed deity. Such is a bequest to “the Thakurji in his Thakurdwara” (10) though in this case there was evidence that the testator was building a “Thakurdwara” or temple for installation of the image of “Thakurji” or Ramchand. In this view it is submitted that the case was wrongly decided as both the subject and the object were ascertainable with reasonable certainty and in any case the application of cypres should have been considered.

1866. But there can be no doubt that a bequest to spend the residue of a fund “in proper and just acts for the testator’s benefit” is wholly void for the reason given by Lord Davey in the case before cited. (11) Such would also be a devise to “religious purposes,” since in a Hindu mind the phrase might denote something more than and different from charitable purposes. (12)

1867. A bequest to the testator’s agnates or to Brahmins is void for ambiguity as to the object in that it is uncertain as to which of them the testator intended to take. (13)

Synopsis.

- (1) Construction of words in popular sense (1868). ed to have a technical meaning (1868-1869).
- (2) General words judicially recognised (3) Gift or rents and profits (1870).

1868. Construction of words.—It is a rule equally applicable to the construction of all documents, whether deeds or wills, that ordinary words should be construed in their ordinary sense, and not in their technical sense unless there is anything in the context to shew the contrary. As many of the wills of Hindus are written or spoken in the vernacular, English Judges are not in a position to construe them with the same advantage as native Judges. But this is no reason for the court not conversant with the language to consult and decide upon the opinion of a native Judge who had not heard the case. As their Lordships observed in a case : “The learned Judges say that in the construction of the clause they have had the advantage of the opinion of Mr. Justice Gupta, who is fully conversant with the Bengali language which is his mother tongue, and who agrees with them in the meaning to be attached to it. Their Lordships remark upon this that Judges who have heard the arguments and who are responsible for the decision, can hardly with propriety rest it on the authority of one, who has not heard the arguments and is not responsible for the decision although he may be a Judge of the High Court. It is true that this case is a peculiar one in which Judges have to interpret a language which seems to be imperfectly known to themselves and to be familiar to a colleague. But then their Lordships are not informed how Mr. Justice Gupta translates the Bengal words. It is only said that he agrees with the meaning which the other learned Judges below attach to the clause in question. He does not appear to have thrown any new light on the rendering of the words into English. It must be taken that on this point he agrees with his colleagues of the High Court and with their sworn interpreter and with the official translation in the record. If so, the agreement with the decision must be on account of that further reasoning, which has led the courts below to inferences from which their Lordships dissent.”<sup>(1)</sup>

1869. The case from which this passage is cited related to the construction of the critical words in a will “parjyapt baibek” translated by the English words “will become vested,” as to which the High Courts said : “The technical meaning conveyed by the English expressions ‘shall vest’ and ‘shall become vested’ are not in our opinion conveyed by the Bengal words ‘Parjyapt baibek’ which really mean ‘shall devolve or go’ and indicate the line of devolution.”<sup>(2)</sup> Quoting this passage the Privy Council said : “This appears to their Lordships to be a misconception of what words are necessary for the vesting of a bequest or legacy. A bequest in favour of a person simply (that is without any intimation of a desire to suspend or postpone its operation) confers a vested interest. It must be remembered that it is within a comparatively recent period that Indian testators have adopted English modes of creating interests in their estates. There is no line of precedents attaching to Bengali terms meanings which make them understood as terms of art by Bengali lawyers. It is not suggested in this case that the meaning affixed by the courts to the testator's language is a sense required by a course of practice known to vakils. The only safe course is to give to his words the plain ordinary meaning." (1) In the end the Privy Council held the words to convey no more than a direct and simple gift to the eldest son. This case is then an instance of the danger to which the interpreter is exposed by ascribing to a non-technical expression a technical meaning.

1870. But nevertheless certain words such as "malik" "putra putradikrama" "Istemrari" and the rest have now acquired a definite sense in conveyancing and when the context permits, they must be understood in that sense.

So it is held to be a well established rule of construction that a gift of the rents and profits of property is equivalent to a gift of the property itself, and it has also been decided that a gift of the income of property will also carry the legal and beneficial interest in the property itself. (2) The testator bequeathed to his daughter-in-law his property "detailed below" which comprised "all cash, ornaments, utensils included and also two houses." After execution of the will the testator had invested some money on the security of mortgage bonds and the question was whether they could be held as comprised in the term "cash" bequeathed. It was held that they did. "The words in which the gift to her is made are very general and seem to us to be comprehensive enough to include all the property, which is described in the body of the will as ornaments, cash, utensils et cetera. True it is that the words et cetera do not appear in the details of the property but it was, we think, intended by the testator that all moveable and immoveable property of which he was or should be possessed should pass." (3) Where however the testator gave his wife a life-interest in the houses in his possession, and in those which he might afterwards "purchase," and the testator acquired a house by inheritance in consequence of the death of his younger brother and the question arising whether this house equally passed under the will, it was held that the term "purchase" (khareed) was used in its normal sense and did not include the house acquired by inheritance. "It may be thought that at the time of the execution of the will he did not contemplate the contingency of his acquiring any immoveable property otherwise than by purchase, and that, had he contemplated such a contingency he would have provided for it, and would have left to his widow all his real property, however acquired by him subsequently to the date of his will. This is a surmise not destitute of plausibility, although, if it be true, the circumstance that he did not add a codicil to the will, after he had inherited the house in question from his brother, for the purpose of supplying the defect in the terms of the clause which is the subject of consideration, and securing the devolution to his widow of the aforesaid house is not easily explained." (4)

1871. In another case the testator had died in 1857 leaving a will, dated January 1857, clause 11, of which provided that all his residuary estate "shall descend in equal shares to the eldest son to be born to each of the daughters of my late brother who are now alive." By clause 15 of the will the testator declared that "until the majority of whoever may be the eldest at the time amongst the sons of my brother's daughters, the estate shall remain in the hands of the executor absolutely and for all purposes." At the time of the testator's death two daughters of his brother were living, of whom C was married and F unmarried, C had a son born in 1858 who lived to be 21 years of age, and to whom on his attaining that age a moiety of the estate was made over by the executor. F married W in 1878, the only issue of the marriage being a son born in 1883, who lived only a few hours. It was held that a moiety of the estate vested in the sons of C and F on their birth and that the vesting was not suspended by the direction, that the estate should remain in the hands of the executor, who should "make over the share" of each on his attaining 21 years; those words merely pointed to the possession and enjoyment of the shares, which had already been vested. The words "the sons of those daughters" following the bequest referred to the sons to whom it was made, namely the eldest son of each daughter. On the birth of F's son, therefore, a moiety of the estate vested in him, and on his death passed to his father as his heir. (1) technical terms.

- (1) Technical terms to be construed (1872).
    in their legal sense (1872). (3) Technical terms in vogue in
(2) But may be varied by context India (1872-1876).

1872. Technical terms.—There are no technical terms, strictly so-called. By consensus of opinion the courts ascribe to certain words a definite meaning. In this sense these words may be taken to have become terms of art as connoting a certain sense when used in deeds and wills.

Such are the words malik and putra pouradi Krame<sup>(2)</sup> or putrapoutrad<sup>(3)</sup> which are understood as words of general inheritance and generally as conveying an absolute interest, but this sense may be limited by the context. As observed by Lord Davey: "There are two cardinal principles in the construction of wills, deeds and other documents, which their Lordships think are applicable to the decision of this case. The first is that clear and unambiguous words are not to be controlled or qualified by any general expression of intention. The second is to use Lord Denman's language, that technical words or words of known import must have their legal effect even though the testator uses inconsistent words, unless those inconsistent words are of such a nature as to make it perfectly clear that the testator did not mean to use the technical terms in their proper sense."<sup>(4)</sup> A will contained the following in favour of the testator's sister's son, viz., that he "becoming my substitute and becoming malik of all my estate and properties shall . . . . . enjoy, with son, grandson, and so on, in succession (putra pouradi Krame) the proceeds of my estate." Provisions followed for the maintenance of his nephew's widow and of his daughter, should he die; and a gift over that "in the absence of the said nephew's son, grandson, great-grandson, and so on, then of the sons born of my sisters . . . the eldest with son, grandson, and so on with succession, shall" receive the ownership. On a claim by the nearest gotraj sapinda of the testator against the nephew for the construction of the will, it was held by the High Court that there being expressions excluding the succession of females and conferring the succession to male heirs, and the gift over referring to the failure of male issue at any remote time and not to the event of Lalit's death without having male issue, and there being also expressions indicating an intention not to grant an absolute alienable estate, the will should be construed as giving to Lalit only a life-estate. But this view was reversed by the Privy Council who said: "Their Lordships cannot find any sufficient reasons for importing into the gift to the appellant an implied prohibition against females succeeding as heirs so as to limit the nature or extent of the estate taken by the appellant or confine it by construction to heirs male although his estate may be defeasible if the gift over is valid and the event on which it takes effect should occur." (1)

1873. In Bombay where a more favourable view prevails as regards the rights of female heirs, it has been held that a gift over to the daughter as my "wars" (heir) conveys the same absolute estate which would have passed if the term used were malik (owner). (2) But it will be presently seen that words which are sufficient to convey an absolute estate in favour of a male have not necessarily the same effect when the donee is a female. The same sense is conveyed by the phrase Santan Sreni Kramic (3) or words which convey the sense that the estate is granted to the donee's "children and grand-children" which are words of enlargement and not of limitation. The testator granted a talug to his sister K "with all rights appertaining thereto . . . to you and the generations born of your womb successively to enjoy the same. No other heir of yours shall have right or interest." On the question arising as to the nature of the estate thus conveyed the Privy Council held that the words "you and the generations born of your womb" were intended to convey an absolute estate the effect of which was not cut down by the negative words which were capable of being read as referring to the time of K's death and "that their effect is to make the absolute estate before given, defeasible in the event of a failure of issue living at the time of her death, in which event the estate was to revert to the donor and his heirs." (4)

1874. It has already been seen that the term "putra" means in Sanskrit and in Bengali not only a son, but also a son's son and a son's son's son the three being regarded as one person in law. Consequently, when the testator spoke of a person as dying without leaving sons, the condition is satisfied only if he dies leaving no son, grandson or great-grandson in the male line. (5) And the term "issue" not only includes children but also a son adopted by the widow under authority from her husband. (6) Unless the term is qualified by the word "auras" or self-begotten it does not exclude an issue by adoption. (7) Again the terms "aulad" or santan import issue both male and female. (8) Unless a different intention appears from the context limiting it only to male issue, that term is however ordinarily confined only to legitimate issue though if the gift is made by will of the corpus of a fund, or a life-interest in a fund to the children of the testator or of another as a class, it would probably include also the illegitimate issue. (1) The word "Bans" is of doubtful import and may mean either agnatic kinsmen or descendants. The last term again is confined only to children and grand-children and not to the testator's brother or widow. (2) So where the testator gave his widow the power to adopt from amongst my father's "Bans" it was held to refer to his paternal agnatic kinsmen and not to the descendants of his father. (3)

1875. The word "family" is an elastic term and may mean a person and his wife and children or the larger group of a person and his descendants and their wives. So where the testator created a trust for the support of the testator's "family" the question arose what that word included and it was held by White, J., to mean the relatives of the testator whether connected by marriage or blood who were living at the time of the testator's death and then formed part of his household and were maintained by him. But on appeal this construction was held to be too wide, the court restricting it to include only the testator's descendants and their wives living at the time of his death. (4)

1876. The word "hamesha" "always" or "for ever" though implying perpetuity, may be limited in their import by the context. And taken by themselves they do not per se extend the interest beyond the person who is named. They are not inconsistent with limiting the interest given, but the circumstances under which the instrument is made or the subsequent conduct of the parties may show the intention with sufficient certainty to enable the court to presume that the grant was perpetual. (5) So where a decree provided that A should always pay B Rs. 70 per month and the question arising whether the charge was to cease with B's death or was heritable, the court held that there was nothing to show that the payment was to continue after B's death. (6)

196. The construction must be uniform, the same words being construed in the same sense, unless a contrary intention appear by the context, or unless the words be applied to a different subject.

Construction must be uniform.

1877. Construction must be uniform.—This rule is though equally general, does not coincide with the English rule which does not favour the same construction of words though appearing in one clause, if they apply to realty and personalty respectively. (7) So where there is a gift of realty and personalty together to children "or their heirs" the word "heirs" is read in a dual sense, as denoting heir-at-law as regards the realty and next of kin as regards the personalty. (8) But this is an artificial rule due to the statute of distribution for which there is no parallel in this country; and no such distinction is therefore authorized by the law of construction. The context may of course indicate that the same word was intended to be used in a dual sense. So while the term "aulad" or "issue" is normally used to mean only a legitimate issue, where the context shows that the testator intended to benefit all his issue whether legitimate or illegitimate, it will be so construed. (1)

1878. The rule on the subject is thus formulated in the Succession Act :

Interpretation of words repeated in different parts of will.

73. If the same words occur in different parts of the same will, they must be taken to have been used everywhere in the same sense, unless there appears an intention to the contrary.

This is a general rule, and applies not only to the wills of Hindus subject to the Hindus Wills Act, (2) but all wills alike. (3) "The will is the dictionary from which you are to find the meaning of the terms which the testator has used." (4) "The principle is, that if words acquire a special meaning by reason of their context, that meaning cannot be safely given to them when used in a different context." (5) Considerations which only show that a testator has made a disposition in his will which the court is surprised to find there, though they might have determined the sense in which the testator had used an ambiguous expression, cannot of themselves lead the court to refuse to give effect to the plain language he has employed. Where for instance, the testator makes a bequest to his children it cannot be read as one limited only to the sons to the exclusion of the daughters. (6) So where the testator made a will whereby he appointed his wife as his executor and heir; and provided that if a son be born to him that son should be the owner of the residue, and if no son be born then his wife should be the owner, the court held that on the failure of the contingency contemplated the wife took an absolute estate. (7) Where words of contingency form part of the description of the class of persons to take, as in the case of a gift to those 'who shall attain the age of 21' the words must receive their natural construction, and no estate vests in any one till he attains the prescribed age. In such a case there must be something in the context pointing to a different construction, or something in the will inconsistent with the literal construction, to justify a court in adopting any but the literal construction. In the words of contingency occurring in the description of the class of persons to take, a mere gift over is not sufficient to alter their meaning. (8)

1879. So where the testator appointed four trustees to his will, and provided: "upon your death, these properties shall similarly devolve on your heirs" and it was contended that while the words "your" referred to the four trustees "your death" was intended not to refer to the death of all the trustees, the court rejected the construction holding that there was nothing in the context to justify departure from the normal rule. 1880. All words must be considered.—Again it is evident that all words used in a will must receive their due importance. This is emphasized by Jaimini who quotes Karik's—terse aphorism—"more words, more meaning" (202). This rule is thus enacted in the Succession Act.

72. No part of a will is to be rejected as destitute of meaning if it is possible to put a reasonable construction upon it.

The rule is taken from the English law and may be thus illustrated. (1)
No part rejected if it can be reasonably construed      If one devises land to A in fee and later on in the same will devises to C for life, both parts of will stand. C will take first and A on determination of C's interest. (2)

1881. Although the cardinal rule in the construction of wills is to give effect to the intention of the testator, the duty of the court is to discover not what the testator meant but what is the meaning of his words. (3)

Construction must be benignant.

198. That construction, must be preferred which will prevent a total intestacy.

Construction against intestacy.—This rule is a natural corollary of that which favours the benignant construction of wills, giving effect to its bequests as far as possible and after straining every nerve to make a sense out of the most uncouth declaration of the deceased. Consequently, of two modes of construction law favours that which will prevent a total intestacy. (4) So where the testator bequeathed his estate to his two wives A and B and his nephew C in equal shares providing that so long as his wives A and B will remain alive all the three shall enjoy in equal shares, and on the death of A her share will be enjoyed by B and C in equal shares and on the death of both A and B, C shall obtain the estate absolutely. C survived A but predeceased B

CHAPTER XIX.

RELIGIOUS AND CHARITABLE ENDOWMENTS.

1900. Topical Introduction.—The present law relating to religious and charitable endowments has grown out of the numerous inculcations commending and enjoining the making of gifts to such objects. The rest is statute and case law. The sacred texts contain no rules for the management of charities in which the pious founders have invested their fortunes. Probably no other country in the world can boast of such munificent bequests made in the case of religion and charity. But like all other countries these endowments have to a large extent been diverted from their original purpose and are now held in quasi-proprietary rights. Unavailing efforts have been made from time to time to control their administration; but the Government, pledged to religious neutrality, is slow to move; and the only provisions to be found in the statute book are those contained in the Religious Endowments Act and S. 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The Trusts Act does not touch them and the Religious Endowments Act is a misnomer since it merely transfers to Government the powers previously possessed by the Board of Revenue. It merely deals with public religious foundations. Apart, however, from the statute law, the common law has laid down in terms, which admit of no equivocation, that religious and charitable endowments whatever their nature and character, are essentially trusts of which the manager for the time being—by whatever name he may be called—whether Shebait, Mahant or Dharmadhikari, is a trustee and that as such he has no power of alienation of the corpus which he is bound to maintain for the purpose for which it was created. Even the Mahant of a Muth who was at one time held to be in the nature of a proprietor has now been accorded a place alongside of other trustees and in no way distinguishable as regards his power of administration and alienation.

1901. Hindu endowments may be divided into public and private. The following graphic table presents their leading connection:—

It will thus be seen that all charitable endowments are public. A private charity is not an endowment, since its benefaction is limited and does not reach the class of persons sufficiently large to be classed as public. The only instance of a private endowment is that furnished by a family endowment for the benefit of a private idol. Neither the public nor the court has any control over it. The vast majority of endowments are those designated public and of these, religious endowments form an important class. They are subject to uniform rules stated in this chapter. Endowments which are charitable without being religious will probably occupy a greater prominence in the future. They are also governed by the same rules. They are both subject to the Cypres rule of construction which enables the court to give effect to them even when as bequests to secular uses, they would have failed.

203. (1) Endowment is the dedication of property by Endowment defined. gift or devise to religious or charitable uses.

(2) An endowment must be certain both as to the subject and the object.

(3) A dedication of property to an endowment may be partial or complete.

(4) It is partial when there is merely a charge or trust created.

(5) It is complete when the property is dedicated absolutely and no person has any beneficial interest therein.

Explanation :—An endowment is distinguishable from a bequest in that its operation is perpetual and the object general.

1902. Analogous Law.—The following are but a few out of the numerous texts to be found on the subject of endowments:—

Manu :—328. Should the king be near his end through some incurable disease, he must bestow on the priests all his riches accumulated from legal fines; and having duly committed his kingdom to his son, let him seek death in battle, or, if there be no war, by abstaining from food. (1)

Yishnu :—81. Let him (the king) bestow landed property upon Brahmins.

82. To those upon whom he has bestowed (land) he must give a document, destined for the information of a future ruler which must be written upon a piece of (cotton) cloth, or a copper-plate and must contain the names of his three immediate ancestors, a declaration of the extent of the land and an imprecation against him who should appropriate the donation to himself, and should be signed with his own seal.

88. Let him not appropriate to himself landed property bestowed (upon Brahmins) by other (rulers).

84. Let him present the Brahmins with gifts of every kind. <sup>(1)</sup>

Mitakshara :—Both he who accepts land and he who gives it are performers of a holy deed, and shall go to a region of bliss. <sup>(2)</sup>

Id. (citing the last) Since donation is praised, if a sale be made it should be conducted for the transfer of immoveable property, in the form of a gift, delivering it with gold and water (to ratify the donation).

Sancha :—Wealth was conferred for the sake of defraying sacrifices.

Though in the case of secular gifts delivery of possession is necessary to complete a gift, it is dispensed with when the gift is in favour of religion or charity. And though other gifts are void if made by a man who is afflicted with disease and the like, a gift to religion is irrevocable and may on death of the promisor be enforced against his son. <sup>(3)</sup>

Katyayan :—What a man has promised in health or in sickness for a religious purpose must be given, and if he die without giving it, his son shall doubtless be compelled to deliver it <sup>(4)</sup>

1903. The Hindu Law of gifts being applicable to wills, it follows that while the Smritis encourage unfettered gift to religion and charity, the only check that the clerical inculcations receive is from the inclination of the testator and the calls of other claimants upon his affection and liberality. But where no such claimants exist or the testator is susceptible to the influences of religion, he is known to make wholesale bequests of his estate to religious charity. <sup>(5)</sup> And such bequests have been held to be even free from the rule against perpetuities. "It being assumed to be a principle of Hindu Law that a gift can be made to an idol, which is a caput mortuum and incapable of alienating, you cannot break in upon that principle by engrafting upon it the English law of perpetuities." <sup>(6)</sup>

1904. The encouragement which charitable bequests have thus received both from the sacred and the secular laws have naturally prompted persons to make illusory bequests where while the form is religious, the intention is to benefit the devisee. Such illusory devises are however subject to the ordinary law.

1905. In England and in the law as enacted in S. 17 of the Transfer of Property Act religious trusts are classed as charitable trusts. So Lord Langdale, M. R., said: "All the cases with one exception go to support the proposition that a religious purpose is a charitable purpose." <sup>(7)</sup> But as will be seen from the definition given in the section the two purposes though allied, are yet distinguishable and different.

1906. The first essential of a valid endowment is that it must dedicate some certain property to religious or charitable uses. This implies that the donor must divest himself of the ownership of the property to the extent it is transferred or charged for the support of the endowment. A deed which is not intended to be acted upon by the executant and which does not divest the owner of his share in the property is inoperative. <sup>(8)</sup> When there has been no direct endowment to support the family idol or other religious or charitable object, Hindu usage and custom, although it would create a moral obligation, still such obligation will not be held to have the effect of a legal obligation. <sup>(9)</sup> One test of an endowment as to whether it is bona fide or nominal is to see how the founder himself treated the property, and how the descendants have since treated it. (1)

1907. There can be no endowment without dedication. (2) Where, therefore, in a document there was nothing to shew that there was such a dedication except the use of the word "debutter" and the grant was made apparently for the personal enjoyment of the grantee, though the grantor may have contemplated that the profits of the property, after satisfying the personal wants of the grantee would be devoted to the service of the God whom he attended, it was held that such an expectation may explain the use of the word "debutter" but does not suffice to constitute a valid dedication to the God. (3) The mere fact of the proceeds of a piece of land having been appropriated for the worship of an idol does not constitute it an endowed property but the fact of the assignment to the idol must be specifically proved. (4) The mere fact of its being released by Government on the ground of its being appropriated to the service of an idol does not impose on it the character of a religious endowment. (5)

1908. Secondly, both the subject and the object must be certain, that is to say, it must be certain what is given, and to whom. (2) Subject and object must be certain. Instances have already been given where bequests have failed because either the subject or the object was vague and indefinite.

1909. Dedication,—partial and complete.—While dedication is of the essence of an endowment it is not necessary that the dedication should be absolute or complete as regards the quantum of interest possessed by the owner, who may endow a specific sum or interest thereof, such as "Rs. 500 per annum charged on my estate or such surplus as may remain after defraying the household expenses." So where the testator by will devised all his moveable and immoveable property to his family idol, and after stating that he had four sons or grandsons in succession, but that they should enjoy "the surplus proceeds only" and the will after appointing one of the sons manager to the estate, to attend to the festivals and ceremonies of the idol and maintain the family, further directed that whatever might be the surplus after deducting the whole of the expenditure, the same should be added to the corpus, and in the event of a disagreement between the sons and family, the testator directed, that after the expenses of the family, whatever net proceeds and surplus there might be, should be divided annually in certain proportions among the members of the family, it was held that the bequest to the idol was not an absolute gift but was to be construed as a gift to the testator's four sons and their offspring in the male line, as a joint family, so long as the family remained joint and that the four sons were entitled to the surplus of the property after providing for the performance of the ceremonies and festivals of the idol and the provisions in the will for maintenance. (6) In other words, this was a secular bequest in the guise of a religious endowment but in which the religious motive was not illusory. As Turner, L. J., said: "According to the true construction of the will the property granted to the idol is effectually granted for the benefit of the testator's four sons and their offspring in the male line as a joint family, subject to the performance of acts, business, ceremonies and festivals and to the provision for maintenance in the will contained and that the surplus income, after answering the performance of such provisions, is in like manner well and effectually given for the benefit of the four sons and their offspring in the male line in the joint family." (1) This case was followed in another case in which the court had to decide upon the following facts. The plaintiff sued for partition alleging the property was joint, but that out of the profits certain expenses for the worship of God and performance and celebration of certain religious festivals and ceremonies were incurred, all of which were alleged to be patrimonial, the balance being divided amongst the co-sharers. The defence was that the whole of the ijmalce land was the property of the idol. It was held that since there was no dedication of the property to the idol by its transfer from the family in its favour, the land was partible but subject to a trust in favour of the idol. (2)

1910. The converse case was that of the testatrix who left by will to her sons lands belonging to her, to support the daily worship of an idol, and defray the expenses of certain other religious ceremonies with a provision that in the event of there being a surplus after these uses had been satisfied out of the revenue of the said lands, such surplus should be applied to the support of the family. It was held that this provision amounted to a bequest of the surplus to the members of the joint family for their own use and benefit, and that each of the sons of the testatrix took a share in the property which after satisfying the religious and ceremonial trusts might be considerable and could not be presumed to be valueless. In so holding Sir Barnes Peacock said: "It cannot be said that the property was wholly debutter. They consider that it created a charge upon the property for the expenses of the daily worship of the idol as it was performed at the death of the testatrix." (3) Referring to these cases, the Privy Council said: "There is no doubt that an idol may be regarded as a judicial person capable as such of holding property though it is only in an ideal sense that property is so held. And probably this is the true legal view when the dedication is of the completest kind known to the law. But there may be religious dedications of a less complete character. The cases of Sonatum Bysack v. Juggutsoondree Dossee (4) and Ashutosh Dutt v. Doorga Churn Chatterjee (5) are instances of less complete dedications, in which notwithstanding a religious dedication property descends (and descends beneficially) to heirs subject to a trust or charge for the purposes of religion. Their Lordships desire to speak with caution but it seems possible that there may be another class of cases of partial or qualified dedication not quite so simple as those to which reference has been made." (6) Then their Lordships confessed that if they had to determine the nature of the dedication in the case before them, they would have felt great difficulty in doing so. This question their Lordships had not to consider for the purpose of the case. But the question raised was whether the land in suit was debutter so granted by Government to the plaintiff's predecessor and so described in the settlement pattas of 1868 and 1877, referring to which their Lordships observed: "On the one hand the use of the term 'Sebait' in the settlement pattas of 1868 and 1877 and in the plaint in this suit, points rather to a dedication of the completest character. On the other hand the provisions in those pattas which impose liability upon the grantees to the whole extent of their own property and not merely to the extent of what they might hold as Shebaita suggest a different conclusion. And so does the clause in the patta of 1868 empowering Government to determine the term on death." (1) Their Lordships then assumed, for the purpose of their argument, the religious dedication to have been of the strictest character.

Absolute dedication. 1911. On the other side of the line fall cases such as the following :—

The family dwelling house belonged to a lady who executed a deed of gift purporting to give it to an idol. By this deed she appointed her sons managers of the trust and provided that they should live in the house; that they should not be able to partition or sell any part of the endowed property and that the surplus profits after providing for the Government revenue, expenses of establishment and worship and salary of the manager, for the time being, should be expended in the purchase of adjacent lands in the name of the idol for the accommodation of the families of the managers and in the erection of a new building thereon. Wilson, J., held this to constitute an absolute gift to the idol "but that subject to a trust for worship there was a gift for the benefit of the members of her family mentioned in the deed. . . . The deed in terms gives the house to the idol and appoints the four surviving sons managers. The house is to be the perpetual habitation of the idol." (2)

1912. Under the Hindu Law an idol as symbolical of certain religious purposes is capable of being endowed or vested with the property. But it is not an essential condition of a valid endowment that it should take the form of an express gift to an idol. All that is necessary is that the religious purposes or objects of the testator should be clearly specified and that the property intended for the endowment should be set apart for or dedicated to these purposes. (3) In 1544 a village was granted to the head of a Gossavi Muth to be enjoyed from generation to generation and the deed of grant provided that the grantee was "to improve the muth, maintain the charity and be happy." The office of the head of muth was hereditary in the grantee's family. In 1866 an inam title-deed was issued to the then head of the muth whereby the village was confirmed to him and his successors tax free to be held without interference so long as the conditions of the grant are duly fulfilled. It was found, regard being had to usage, that the trusts of the institution were the upkeep of the muth, the feeding of pilgrims, the performance of worship, the maintenance of water-shed and the support of the descendants of the grantee. From before 1840 it had been usual for the head of the muth for the time being to make grants to his brothers or younger sons for their maintenance. In 1842 the father of the present plaintiff being the head of the muth granted certain lands of the village above referred to to his younger brother, the deed of grant being in terms absolute. The grantee died about 30 years before the suit and the lands in question came into possession of the widow and a mortgagee from her respectively. In 1863 the plaintiff's father placed certain other lands in possession of defendant 3 who paid rent therefor and received pattas for some years from the plaintiff, who sued for possession when defendant 3 pleaded a right of permanent occupancy.

The court however ejected him holding that the village was granted as an endowment for the muth and charities connected with it and that what might remain after due execution of those trusts was intended to be applied to the maintenance of the grantee or his descendants. An absolute grant could not be made and the grant was good to that extent only. (1)

certain extent they are both subject to the same liberal rule of construction, it being held that where the object is charitable, a bequest should not fail for uncertainty. So a direction to the executors to set apart a specific sum for distribution among the testator's "poor relations, dependants and servants" was held to be a valid charitable bequest, the court construing the word "poor" to apply to all beneficiaries. 1914. Analogous Law.—The following definition of charitable purpose occurs in the Charitable Endowments Act. (3)

S. 2. In this Act "charitable purpose" includes relief of the poor, education, medical relief and the advancement of any other object of general public utility, but does not include a purpose which relates exclusively to religious teaching of worship.

S. 17 of the Transfer of Property Act also alludes to religious and charitable endowments as being for "the benefit of the public in the advancement of religion, knowledge, commerce, health, safety or any other object beneficial to mankind." There is a clear distinction between religious and charitable endowments—the one proceeds from a motive of piety, the other from benevolence. But in practice the two are at times combined—as where an endowment is made for the establishment of a temple and distribution of alms to the poor. But an endowment may be charitable without being religious. Such is an endowment to found a professorship (4) a University (5) or support a Serai, Dharamsala or a hospital. (6)

1915. Gifts for religious and charitable uses have been the first to be favoured in all countries overridden by priestly influences. In medieval Europe practically everything a man possessed was left to the Church. And similar abuses had crept into England till they brought into existence the statute <sup>(1)</sup> passed in 1547 restraining bequests to superstitious uses which ordained that if any real or personal property whatever shall have been or shall be, since assigned, limited, or appointed to have continuance for ever, or for a time only, towards or for the finding or maintenance of a stipendiary priest, or for the maintenance of an anniversary or obit, or chapel, or other like intent, these and such like gifts and dispositions as these, are to be accounted within the superstitious uses intended to be suppressed by the Act. Establishments or foundations for securing prayers for the souls of the dead were to be deemed superstitious within the statute. <sup>(2)</sup> Other bequests to superstitious uses not mentioned by the Act are deemed void by the general policy of the law as a devise for the good of the soul of the devisor. <sup>(3)</sup> The statute provides that bequests made void by it shall vest in the crown beneficially though if it is for charitable purposes the crown may order to what charitable purpose it shall be disposed. <sup>(4)</sup> This statute was amended and re-enacted from time to time <sup>(5)</sup> and it was consolidated and re-enacted as the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act 1888. <sup>(6)</sup>

1916. In India the statute prohibiting the gift or devise of property to superstitious uses was never in force, and there is no other law to restrain the priestly inculcations to make pious and charitable bequests in the name of religion.

Otherwise there is nothing to discriminate between this and a benami transaction and such endowments if permitted, would lead to fraud and confusion of titles. This has been laid down in several cases. (1) Of course it is quite open to a person to set up his own Thakur and endow it with property but so long as he does not divest himself of property for the benefit of his proprietary Thakur there is no dedication but if there be a dedication by the appointment of trustees or otherwise, the endowment would be valid, whatever suspicion may attach to it on the ground that it might be a colourable devise to evade the law relating to the devolution of property in accordance with the ordinary law. (2) Where for instance the testator bequeathed certain property to his mother who was to have managed it on behalf of the idol to whom the property was dedicated but the testator had added, "The right and power of gift are yours; I and my heirs shall have no liberty, claim or right" it was held that the property vested in the donee and that therefore there was no absolute dedication of the property which was a pre-requisite of an endowment. (3) "A public endowment for religious uses is one which distributes its benefits to all men of all classes professing a defined form of religion; a similar endowment for pious and charitable purposes would include all members of the community who chose to avail themselves of the means afforded them by the appropriation. Every one would have an equal right to participate, and that at all times and at all seasons." (4) The difference between a public and a private endowment is one of degree. But the difference between the two when they constitute a religious endowment is material, since the public are interested in and possess a right in the one which they have not in the other.

1918. Public endowments.—Where the nature of the trust cannot be ascertained from the deed of endowment, its character has to be ascertained from extrinsic evidence as to the founder's intention and how it was regarded by the founder or his family and the public, if any, interested in it. Two facts are in this case material, how was it regarded by the founder and his heirs and how was it regarded by the public. If for instance there is anything to show that the founder intended to benefit the public as that it was open to them, and that the customary religious festivals had been celebrated there in a public manner, the court may treat the trust as public. (5) The fact that a temple is open for public worship, that the rites and ceremonies are such as are observed in public temples and that numerous inam lands have been granted to the temple constitute strong evidence of its public character. (6) To be public, it is not necessary that the institution should be open to the public at large. All that is necessary is that it should benefit a caste, a section of a caste, a class or a body of men sufficiently general to be called public.

206. (1) An endowment may be created by an oral dedication by a person divesting himself of specific property for religious or charitable uses.

Form of endowment.

Where it is created by gift, it is not subject to the provisions of S. 123 of the Transfer of Property Act. And as the Trusts Act does not apply to such endowments, <sup>(1)</sup> it need not be in writing registered as therein provided. <sup>(2)</sup> Even the creation of a trust is not necessary. As West, J., said: "A Hindu who wishes to benefit a religious or charitable institution may, according to his law, express his purpose and endow it, and the ruler will give effect to the charity, or at least protect it so far, at any rate, as it is consistent with his own Dharm or conceptions of morality. A trust is not required for this purpose; the necessity of a trust in such a case is indeed a peculiarity and a modern peculiarity of the English law. In early times a gift placed, as it was expressed, "on the altar of God" sufficed to convey to the Church the lands thus dedicated. Under the Roman law of pre-Christian ages such dedications were allowed only to specified national deities. After Christianity had become the religion of the Empire, dedications to particular churches or for the foundation of churches and of religious and charitable institutions were much encouraged." <sup>(3)</sup> They have been also encouraged by the Hindu Smritikars.

1920. There being no legal prohibition against the creation of an oral endowment, all that is necessary being dedication, an endowment may be created by word of mouth <sup>(4)</sup> or in writing at the discretion of the founder. But if it is created by a non-testamentary writing, then it must be registered in accordance with the provisions of S. 17 of the Registration Act.

1921. Again where the endowment is created by a will subject to the provisions of the Hindu Wills Act, then it must be in writing and attested as required in S. 50 of the Succession Act <sup>(5)</sup> which does not exempt endowments from its operation.

1922. Express words unnecessary.—Since law prescribes no form of dedication it follows that no words are necessary to constitute a dedication. "All that is necessary is that the religious purposes or objects of the testator should be clearly specified, and that the property intended for the endowment should be set apart for or dedicated to those purposes." <sup>(6)</sup> In another case the testator bequeathed his house to his daughter for her life and after sundry bequests empowered his executors to sell the residue of the landed property and make over the proceeds to the University of Calcutta. No express words were to be found in the will as to what would become of the house on determination of the daughter's life-estate; but the court held it to fall into the residue which was bequeathed to the University and as such directed the executors to sell it and make over the proceeds with that of the residue of the other estate to the University. (1)

1923. Trust unnecessary.—Under English law no endowment is possible without the creation of a trust but it is held unnecessary for the creation of a Hindu endowment. But though this is the law it is seldom that an endowment is created without the creation of a trust. Suppose for instance, a person were to declare, "I dedicate my village B to the god C." How is the purpose of his dedication to be fulfilled? The god C is a judicial person and cannot take B and unless there is somebody to accept and administer the gift on behalf of C, how are the founder's wishes to be fulfilled. It may be that A administers the fund himself and there is nothing to prevent him from doing so. In that case he becomes the trustee of the fund and his subsequent acts and conduct will show whether he had really divested himself of his property B or had merely used it as a shield for some ulterior purpose. Where therefore, his bona fides are challenged, say by a creditor who attaches B, the burden is heavy on A to show that he had dedicated it to C. (2) As the Privy Council observed, "Very strong and clear evidence of such an endowment ought to exist." (3) The mere fact that the rents and profits of the property have been for some years applied for the worship of the idol may be inconclusive, unless separate accounts are shown to have been kept and the income of the endowed property treated as distinct from the family income showing "that property has been inalienably conferred upon an idol to sustain its worship." (4)

1924. The fact that certain property was purchased in the name of his own idol is equally inconclusive. As the Privy Council said: "The question is whether there is any evidence of an endowment properly so called. Now what is the evidence of an endowment? This was clearly not an endowment for the benefit of the public. The idol was not set up for the benefit of the public worship. There are no priests appointed, no Brahmans who have any legal interest whatever in the fund. It is not like a temple endowed for the support of performing religious service for the benefit of any Hindu who might please to go there. It is simply an idol set up by the Maharaja apparently in his own house, and for what purpose? Why, for his own worship. We constantly have suits claiming certain turns of worship; but here there is no turn or right of worship established. There is nothing stated in any way to show that the Maharaja intended that the idol should be kept up for the benefit of his heirs in perpetuity and before it can be established that lands have been endowed in perpetuity so that they can never be sold and must be tied up in perpetuity, some clear evidence of an endowment must be given. What are the objects of the endowment? None of the essentials of an endowment are stated. The Maharaja appears to have purchased the property in the name of the idol, and that is all. Then he deals with the funds of the idol, as if it were his own property. There is no evidence at all of any of the essentials of an endowment in favour of the idol." (1) But while the founder of a private idol has an uphill task to establish his dedication, the task though difficult is not impossible. Where for instance the fact of the dedication was supported by an ancient document added to which there was the evidence of appropriation of profits for the support of the idol, the Privy Council said: "The mere fact of the proceeds of any land being used for the support of an idol may not be proof that those lands formed an endowment for the purpose (2) but it is a fact that may well be taken into consideration when, as in this case the intention of the founder has to be gathered from an ancient document expressed, to say the least, in ambiguous language contemporaneo expositio est optima." (3)

1925. When once an endowment is established the mere fact that there had been sales and mortgages (4) of the property by some members, of partition of it amongst the shebais (5) or that the conditions of the trust have not been performed (6) does not alter its character, though properties dedicated to a family idol may be converted into secular property by the consensus of the family. As the Privy Council observed, "Where the temple is a public temple the dedication may be such that the family itself could not put an end to it; but in the case of a family idol, the consensus of the whole family might give the estate another direction." (7) Consequently in the case of such endowment the fact that a certain property was at one time debutter raises no presumption of its continuance which must be proved by the manner it has been held and enjoyed and its income appropriated. (8)

1926. Registration when necessary.—This section only deals with the creation of an endowment, but not with the endowment of an existing foundation. If, for instance, a person wishes to endow a temple, muth or an idol his endowment must take the form of a gift either to the trustees or to the idol. In the first case the gift would, it is said, be subject to S. 123 of the Transfer of Property Act, though not if the gift is made directly to the idol. (9)

1927. In this case strictly speaking there is no gift, since there can be no acceptance by the idol. All that the giver can do is to dedicate the property for its acceptance. (10)

207. Any property which a person can dispose of by gift or will may form the subject of an endowment.

1928. Analogous Law.—Since an endowment is the gift of one's property to the service of God or of men in whom resides the spirit of God, a property which a person is competent to dispose of by gift or will, he is equally competent to dispose of in charity.

1929. A mere easement may however be dedicated, though it cannot be transferred. The deceased had built a ghat as the last resting place of persons on the point of death where the rites of antarjali (or last rite of water) was performed. It was held that as the deceased had appointed no shebait he did not intend to part with the ownership of the ghat but that nevertheless there was the dedication of an easement in favour of the Hindu community. (1)

Operation of endowment.

208. An endowment takes effect from the moment of dedication.

Synopsis.

- (1) Operation of endowment (1930). (2) Question of intention (1930).

1930. Analogous Law.—An endowment may be created to take effect from any time in presenti, as from the execution of the deed of endowment, in futuro as on the death of the testator; or at any time on determination of one or more life estates. (2) In each case it is a question of intention. And since endowments are free even from the rule against perpetuity, there is practically no legal impediment to their creation. So where the testator bequeathed his house to his daughter for her life, the residue to be sold by his executors and the proceeds made over to University of Calcutta. No express provision was to be found in the will as to what would happen to the house in question on determination of the daughter's life-estate. It was held that the reversion in the house expectant on the determination of the daughter's life-interest passed under the specific residuary devise in favour of the University of Calcutta. (3)

209. In the absence of any thing appearing to the contrary the beneficial interest in dedicated property vests in the religious or charitable object, while the trustee or manager is entitled to its possession and management.

(2) Debutter property is property dedicated to a god or gods. The trustee or manager of such property is called a Sarbarakar, Shebait, Dharm Karta or Mahant.

Synopsis.

1931. Analogous Law.—There is no uniform rule governing religious and charitable endowments. The endower may make a direct bequest to the object of his bounty without the intervention of trustees; or he may transfer the property in trust. But whatever the nature of the bequest, ownership in the property so bequeathed vests in the idol, muth, temple or other object of his bounty, while the manager possesses the right of possession and management.

Debutter property is property dedicated to a god or gods. (1)

An idol (2) a muth (3) or a temple is a juridical person and can hold property. But it is like the Church a person in perpetual minority and requires someone to manage its estate.

1932. Such manager is variously called Sarbarakar, Shebait, or Mahant, but his legal character is identical. He is the trustee of the fund, and his rights and liabilities are those of a trustee. He may appoint a Pujari or servant to perform the services for the idol. (4) The destruction of an image does not destroy the endowment (5) since the endowment is not to the idol but to the God of which it is a visible symbol. So the Privy Council said: "The Taluq itself, with which these Jamas were connected by tenure, was dedicated to the religious services of the idol. The rents constituted therefore, in legal contemplation, its property. The Shebait had not the legal property but only the title of manager of a religious endowment." (6) In another case they said: "There is no doubt that an idol may be regarded as a juridical person capable of holding property, though it is only in an ideal sense that property is so held. And probably this is the true legal view when the dedication is of the completest kind known to the law. But there may be religious dedications of a less complete character. The cases of Sonatun Bysack v. Juggutsoondree Dossee (7) and Ashutosh Dutt v. Doorga Churn Chatterjee (8) are instances of less complete dedications in which notwithstanding a religious dedication, property descends (and descends beneficially) to heirs, subject to a trust or charge for the purpose of religion. Their Lordships desire to speak with caution but it seems possible that there may be other cases of partial or qualified dedications, not quite so simple as those to which reference has been made." (9)

1933. The presumption stated in clause 1 however applies "in the absence of anything appearing to the contrary." This must depend upon the terms and condition of the dedication and where these cannot be ascertained by usage. (10)

210. An endowment may be created in favour of an idol, muth or other object, not in existence at the death of the testator.

1934. Analogous Law.—This is an exception to the ordinary Hindu Law which requires that a gift to be valid must be in favour of a sentient being in existence at the moment the gift takes effect. Hence where a gift is made by a will which takes effect on the death of the testator, under Hindu Law, unaffected by the Hindu Disposition of Property Act, the donee must be then in existence. Otherwise the gift shall fail. But religious and charitable endowments being favoured by the sacred law are an exception to the rule. <sup>(1)</sup> The contrary was laid down in some cases in which it was held that the principle of Hindu Law which invalidates a gift other than to a sentient being capable of accepting it, applied equally to a bequest to trustees for the establishment of an image and the worship of a Hindu deity and made such bequest void. <sup>(2)</sup> But these cases have been overruled and the law stated as in this section.

211. An endowment is illusory and void if it is a device illusory and void to preserve the estate to the family of the endowment. endower, or defraud, defeat or delay his other claimants or creditors.

(2) Evasion of law (1936). (4) Substantial bequest to charity necessary (1939).

1935. Analogous Law.—From the fact that a religious endowment is not subject to the rule against accumulations and perpetuities nor was it at one time subject to the ordinary rule of Hindu Law that the donee must be in existence at the death of the testator, testators often resorted to this device for the purpose of evading those laws, added to which an endowment offered a tempting bait to deceive creditors. At one time such pseudo endowments were quite common being truly resorted to for the purpose of withdrawing property alike from the grasp of the oppressor or from the disintegrating action of the ordinary rules affecting it. <sup>(3)</sup> And the fact that an endowment might be validly made in favour of one's private tutelary god without the intervention of trustees or the requirement of an instrument or other mode of publicity, facilitated the use of the god as a benamidar to shuffle out of the creditor's reach property which the debtor could not otherwise shield from their grasp. The crucial test in such cases is of course the intention and the only evidence of intention afforded is that to be found in the act and conduct of the endower. As observed, "In dealing with the question whether an endowment is real or nominal only, the manner in which the dedicated property is held and enjoyed is the most important point for consideration. Now, in the present case, there is no reliable and sufficient evidence to show how during the few months for which the donor lived after the dedication, the income of the properties in dispute was spent, nor is there any such evidence in respect of any period subsequent to his death. It is true there is some vague oral evidence that Rani Anandamoyi all along performed the worship of the idol but the idol being a family idol, she would perform its worship, as every Hindu does, whether there is any endowment in favour of the idol or not." (1) The question in such cases is what outward indicia are there available to prove the reality of the transaction.

1936. The fact that separate accounts were maintained of the rents and profits collected and applied for the worship of the idol is material but not conclusive<sup>(2)</sup> since such accounts might be maintained by any unscrupulous person but where they were so maintained for a period going over half a century it will be strong corroborative evidence of a dedication<sup>(3)</sup> as the fact that the dedicator had been appropriating its income<sup>(4)</sup> or that the property had been the subject of a partition would be evidence against it.<sup>(5)</sup> The mere fact that an idol has been maintained out of the income of a property is no proof of dedication, since such contributions might be voluntary and liable to discontinuance at any time.<sup>(6)</sup> In order to prove an endowment it must be established that an absolute grant was in the first place made with the intention that the profits should be applied for the service of an idol, that the profits have since been so applied, and that members of the family of the founder have not treated the property as one the profits of which were mainly intended to be applied for their benefit.<sup>(7)</sup>

1937. There may be a dedication and yet only a partial dedication as where it is burdened with a charge in respect of a charity in which case the beneficial interest is liable to seizure in execution of a decree.<sup>(8)</sup> Here again a distinction must be made between the bequest of property subject to a certain charge and a bequest of property subject to certain duties.<sup>(9)</sup> To constitute a valid dedication it is not necessary that any specific property should be set apart. A share of the income derivable from the family properties may be dedicated. The family properties will then become subject to a charge for that amount and whoever takes the family properties by alienation or partition will take them subject to that charge. Whether the amount has been set apart by the family is a question of fact to be decided on the evidence adduced in each case.<sup>(10)</sup> Where the testator dedicated his house to the God Shiv and directed that the income from certain promissory notes worth Rs. 10,000 should be appropriated for his worship, the fact that he had also empowered his executor to live in the house did not make the bequest colourable.<sup>(11)</sup>

and the distribution of food and clothes to the poor in the month of Ramzan every year, the surplus being equally divided by his sons, grandsons and their heirs from generation to generation, his estate yielding an annual income of Rs. 1,500 out of which Rs. 300 was spent on charity and Rs. 300 paid to the trustee as his salary leaving a balance of Rs. 900 per annum to feed the family and descendants of the grantors in perpetuity, it was contended that the endowment was illusory in that only 2-5th went to charity while 3-5th went to the heirs; but the Privy Council overruled the contention holding held that the income might fluctuate or decrease permanently and the needs of the charity might expand. It was contended that the trustee might spend little or nothing on charity to which the Privy Council replied that if the trustee failed to perform his trust, the court could interfere. They then said "The sum devoted to these charities is according to any standard not large, though for the present it is abundant for their needs. Having regard to the wealth of the grantors at the date of the deed, the provision made by it is a modest provision."

1939. Their Lordships take the view that, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the dominating purpose and intention of the grantors in executing this deed evidently was to provide adequately for these charities. That was their main and paramount object. The secondary and subsidiary objects was to secure for their families and descendants any surplus that might remain over after the needs of the charities had been satisfied. As the gift for the charities was perpetual, it was necessary and right that the provision for capturing any possible residue should also be perpetual. The provisions of the deed carry out these objects, and that being so it is, in their Lordships view, only right to hold that the effect of the instrument is not to give the trust to the grantors, but to give it in substance to the charitable purposes named in it. If this is so, as they think it is, the deed is within the authorities a good and valid deed of wakf and must be allowed to take effect according to its tenor." (1)

While the father is entitled to make "pious and reverential gifts to Brahmins and also "gifts from affection towards Vishnu and other divinities" (2) still, he is not entitled to do so out of spite towards his son. Such endowment is not bona fide and as such it is void. (3)

212. No endowment can be made the purpose or object of which is illegal.

A Hindu endows a mosque. The endowment is invalid. (4)

1940. Analogous Law.—It is provided by the Contract Act that no contract is legal the purpose or object of which is illegal. (5) A transfer in the same circumstances is prohibited by the Transfer of Property Act. (6)

A person cannot achieve by a bequest what he could not do by a transfer. So an endowment made to start a suicide club would be invalid as opposed to public policy.

Again, and apart from the statute law, a person cannot endow an object not warranted by his personal law. So a Hindu cannot endow a Mahomedan mosque. Such a dedication is doubly void, being prohibited both by the Hindu as well as by the Mahomedan law. (7)

Endowment when revocable.

213. (1) An endowment once completed is both irrevocable and unalterable.

(2) Provided that an endowment in favour of a family idol may be revoked, altered or transferred by the consensus of the family.

Synopsis.

(1) Endowment irrevocable, if once completed (1941). (2) Difference in the case of endowment to a family idol (1942).

1941. Analogous Law.—A gift once completed becomes irrevocable. A fortiori so is an endowment which is a gift to sacred uses. It was in one case argued that an endowment should be regarded as merely revocable appropriation, of which the founder may vary the use, but the contention was dismissed by the Privy Council with these words: "No authority whatever was adduced in support of this position, which strikes at the root of most modern endowments of the like nature." (2) Of course an endowment brought about by coercion, fraud or undue influence may be set aside to the same extent as a gift. But otherwise when it is a voluntary act of public benevolence, it cannot be recalled without detriment to the public in whom a right has become vested.

1942. The case of an endowment in favour of a private family idol is however different. It is an endowment in which the family alone is interested and it is for them to decide whether to continue or abandon it. As the Privy Council observed: "Where the temple is a public temple, the dedication may be such that the family itself could not put an end to it; but in the case of a family idol, the consensus of the whole family might give the estate another direction." (3) This does not contemplate a decision obtained at a family conclave. All it means is that the family who are interested in the upkeep of the idol may by agreement convert debutter into secular properties. (4) But there must be consensus of the family. Where, therefore a private debutter has been partitioned between members of the family for the better enjoyment thereof, and there had been sales and mortgages of portions of the property by some members but there was nothing to show that there was a consensus to give the property a different turn it was held that these facts alone did not alter the debutter character of the property. (5)

1943. Where land has been given as debutter land and the requisite services are not performed, all that the donor can do is to take steps to have the services performed. He cannot recover it in a suit for khas possession. (6)

Who may be appointed manager.

214. (1) No person is disqualified by reason of his caste or sex to be appointed a manager.

(2) A female is not disqualified by reason of her sex from holding a priestly office, though she might not be competent to perform its spiritual duties.

Synopsis.

- (1) Qualification for managership of endowment (1944). (3) Married men (1945).
(2) Eligibility dependent on the nature (1944). (4) Females (1946-1947).

1944. Analogous Law.—The question of eligibility cannot be determined without reference to the nature of the endowment. If its purpose is secular charity there is no limit as to the person that may be appointed its manager. Where the institution is religious, its nature must determine the eligibility of any person to be its manager. In a new foundation the founder usually appoints someone to manage it. And as any Hindu may validly create a religious endowment, it follows that caste is no disqualification. Nor is the sex. But since a gift to Brahmins is commended by the Brahman text writers, pious endowers generally appoint a Brahman to the shebaitship of an idol or temple. But Kshatriyas and even Shudras<sup>(1)</sup> are hereditary shebaites of many a temple and the Jains appoint one of their own creed to that office, while in the case of Muths, Gossavi Bairagis are invariably appointed their Mahant. As these orders are open to all Hindus, caste plays but a secondary part in the election to Mahantship. But it is nevertheless a qualification.

1945. A married man may be appointed a shebait, unless celibacy is made a condition of the office or is necessarily implied by the nature of the institution, e.g., a muth, the Mahant of which must of necessity be a celibate.<sup>(2)</sup>

1946. As regards females, it is competent to a founder to appoint a female shebait<sup>(3)</sup> whose succession to that office may be, moreover, supported by usage.<sup>(4)</sup> In one case it was contended on the authority of Manu<sup>(5)</sup> that as women are not instructed in the Vedas and are simple creatures, they are not fit for priestly duties, but the court held that as in the case before them, the female shebait had been nominated by her husband and gave mantras which were accepted and not objected to, there was nothing to shew that she was disqualified to be an Adhikaree.<sup>(6)</sup>

of the institution. In practice the goddess Devi prefers a priestess of her own sex while the phallic God Shiv would never tolerate a woman high priestess (1) though even here, she may validly fill the office of manager, (2) and even as regards her qualification to the priestship (Archak or Purohit) she has been permitted to hold the office, being held entitled to have the actual worship performed through a male substitute appointed for the purpose, (3) But even here it is open to the founder to appoint a female shebait (4) and usage has recognised the right of a woman to act as Mahant of Biragi muth (5) while there is no objection to her holding the office of trustee of a charitable endowment. (6)

1948. Qualification of manager.—No qualification is necessary for eligibility as manager—though it is obvious that the appointment of a person claiming adversely to the endowment would place him in a position when his interest will conflict with his duty. (7) A minor might be appointed a manager as he might be appointed an agent. But a person who is disqualified by reason of bodily deformity, of bodily disease such as leprosy, of disease of the mind or of the leading of a life which is immoral or is inconsistent with the religious vows, of the office such as that of a Mahant of a muth, cannot be appointed to that office. (8) So again a married man cannot be appointed to be the head of a muth. If he is married and has children he must renounce them before entering upon a life of enforced celibacy and asceticism. (9) In one case the Privy Council held a Beldar (stone-mason) incompetent to be the assignee of a Brahman shebait's right on the ground that he was incompetent to perform worship of the deity at the temple adding: "The office of shebait of a temple was an hereditary office which could not be held by any one who was not a Brahman Panda." (10) But this statement must not be taken as laying down any general rule which would not be in consonance with the established practice.

215. (1) The founder is entitled to provide for the management of any endowment created by him.

Appointment and succession of manager.

(2) He may nominate a shebait and provide for his successor and effect will be given to his wishes if not inconsistent with the general law.

1949. Analogous Law.—The founder of an endowment naturally possesses the right to arrange for its management. As such it is for him to set out a scheme of management, nominate trustees, give general directions as to the mode and manner in which he wishes to serve the object of his bounty. (1) Even where he endows an existing institution it is for him to state the conditions of his offer, since according to Hindu Law when a religious endowment has been founded the right to appoint a manager or superintendent remains in the founder and his descendants, unless there is evidence to show that the founder or his descendants have made any inconsistent disposition. (2)

1950. Where the founder establishes an idol or endows for the establishment of one, without making any provision for its worship, the office of shebait presumably vests in the founder and on his death, in his heirs (3) unless there is any custom or usage showing that the devolution is otherwise. (4)

Even where the founder appoints trustees, in the absence of custom or any provision in the deed of foundation to the contrary, the right of appointment of new trustees vests in the founder's heirs. (5) As regards the members of a Mitakshara family who are joint shebait, the right of shebaitship passes by survivorship. (6)

1951. Who are the founders.—Where the endower is a single individual he is of course the founder. But an institution is sometimes founded by subscriptions by members of a caste, sect or tribe, in which case all the original subscribers alone would be classed as founders. (7) So where the same community founded a temple dedicated to the public, it was held that "although the donations were irrevocably dedicated to certain public purposes, the donors have never lost the right, which was attached to the caste since the beginning, to manage the temple which they founded and the management can only be interfered with as a public charitable trust on proof of maladministration." Where several members are entitled to management in rotation or by turns, the exclusion of one by the other, may become adverse, conferring on the member excluding a title by prescription or at least as a valid family arrangement which will hold good until altered by the court or superseded by a new scheme effected with the concurrence of all parties interested. (1) No person can be appointed as shebait whose interest is adverse to that of the idol. Such are persons who deny the endowment and assert a personal right to the property who cannot be appointed shebait or custodians of the income of the properties and supervisors of the worship of the deity. (2)

The owner of the soil who dedicates a way to the public is entitled to sue for an injunction against one who destroys the improvements effected by him. He is not required to prove special damage. (3)

1952. Appointment by court.—Since a trust cannot fail for want of trustees the court will appoint a manager on the failure of those entitled to appoint him. Where a shebait is dead and there is no provision in the deed of endowment about the mode in which the office is to be filled up, the court will not read into the deed of endowment a provision for appointment to the office of shebait which is not to be found therein. It becomes incumbent upon the representatives of the founders to make an appointment to the office of shebait, and upon failure to do so the court has power to appoint a new trustee and will exercise the power whenever there is a failure of a suitable person to perform the trust either from original or supervening disability to act. The appointment of a fit and proper person to be a new trustee is, however, not a matter of arbitrary discretion of the court. The appointment must be made subject to well known and defined rules, stated by Turner, L. J., as follows : (1) The court will pay due regard to the wishes of the author of the trust if known or ascertainable ; (2) the court will not appoint a new trustee with a view to the interest of some of the persons, beneficially interested under the trust, in opposition either to the wishes of the founders or to the interest of other cestuis que trusts ; and (3) the court, in appointing a trustee, will have due regard to the question, whether the appointment will promote or impede the execution of the trust, for the very purpose of the appointment is that the trust may be better carried into execution. (4)

216. (1) In the absence of any custom or usage to the contrary, the rights and liabilities of the Manager's right of alienation. manager of an endowment are those of the guardian of a minor's estate, that is to say, he may incur debts, charge or alienate the corpus of an endowment if justified by legal necessity or its benefit.

(2) Property belonging to an endowment may be attached and sold in execution of a decree obtained against the manager as such.

(3) Any person interested in the endowment may sue to set aside an improper alienation of its property by the manager.

1953. Analogous Law.—The general rule here formulated is in accord with the statement of law by the Privy Council who speaking of the powers of the manager and head of the family said : “The principle in regard to this is analogous to that of the power vested in the head of a religious endowment or mutt, or of the guardian of an infant family.” (1) This was laid down as far as back as 1875 when the same Board said : “The authority of the shebait of an idol's estate would appear to be in this respect analogous to that of the manager of an infant-heir which was thus defined in a judgment of this committee, delivered by Lord Justice Knight Bruce : “The power of the manager of an infant-heir to charge an estate not his own, is under Hindu Law, a limited and qualified power. It can only be exercised rightly in case of need or for the benefit of the estate. But where, in the particular instance, the charge is one that a prudent owner would make in order to benefit the estate, the bona fide lender is not affected by the precedent mismanagement of the estate. The actual pressure on the estate, the danger to be averted, or the benefit to be conferred upon it, in the particular instance, is the thing to be regarded. But of course, if that danger arises or has arisen from any misconduct to which the lender is or has been a party, he cannot take advantage of his own wrong to support a charge in his own favour against the heir grounded on a necessity which his own wrong has helped to cause. Therefore, the lender in this case, unless he is shown to have acted mala fide, will not be affected though it be shown that with better management the estate might have been kept free from debt." (1)

"It is only in an ideal sense that property can be said to belong to an idol; and the possession and management of it must, in the nature of things, be entrusted to some person as shebait or manager. It would seem to follow that the person so interested must of necessity be empowered to do whatever may be required for the service of the idol, and for the benefit and preservation of its property, at least to as great a degree as the manager of an infant- heir. If this were not so, the estate of the idol might be destroyed or wasted and its worship discontinued, for want of the necessary funds to preserve and maintain them." (2)

1954. Referring to this case, their Lordships in another case said that the position of a shebait was analogous to that of a manager of an infant, and that he had the same authority, which in both cases arises from the necessity of the case, to raise money for the benefit of the estate. (3) In some cases, the shebait is likened to a Hindu widow. (4) In another case of the Calcutta High Court, it was said: "The powers and duties of a shebait may now be taken as almost settled. Apart from his duties in connection with the worship and service of the idol a shebait has the possession and management of the properties. In other words, his possession is that of a manager and he is not only empowered, but bound to do, whatever is necessary for the benefit or preservation of its properties. The liability of the estate of an idol for wrongs committed by its shebait in the reasonable management of its properties is analogous to the liability of a corporation for wrongs committed by its agent in the course of their employment and in the apparent furtherance of its purpose, (5) and in both cases it is founded on the policy of law and without regard to personal default, for both the idol and the corporation are incapable of personal wrong doing. Neither can be invested with rights or duties, except through natural persons who are their agents." (6)

These powers may be exercised even by a de facto manager. (7)

1955. Power of transfer—The manager possesses the power to sell, mortgage or let all or any portion of the endowed property in case of necessity (8) or benefit of the trust. He must not, however, alienate the corpus, if the necessity can be met by borrowing or an alienation of the rents and profits. (9) Even such property may be settled on a permanent lease such as mirasi putni and mokurari grant. (10) Such a lease was granted by the shebait for the completion of a temple which the Privy Council upheld with these words : " Here can it be said the grant of a mokurari patta was an improvident way of raising money, if it were necessary to do it at all. It still left a rent for the sustentation of the idol ; and if the transaction be bona fide, any subsequent sale of part of the rent was justified by the imperious necessity of finishing the temple which had been commenced." <sup>(1)</sup> But apart from legal necessity or benefit, a shebait has no authority to lease debutter property even to a co-shebait. <sup>(2)</sup> A permanent lease unsupported by justifying necessity would, on the most favourable construction, enure only for the life-time of the grantor. <sup>(8)</sup> But there is nothing to prevent a shebait from transferring debutter land to another member of his family for the purpose of continuing the worship of the idol. <sup>(4)</sup>

1956. In one case it was held that the profits of a debutter may be assigned so long as the worship is duly kept up. <sup>(5)</sup> But the profits of an endowment are as much debutter property as the corpus and the same rule applies to both. As the Privy Council observed, " The Taluq itself with which these Jamas were connected by tenure, was dedicated to the religious services of the idol. The rents constituted, therefore, in legal contemplation, its property. The shebait had not the legal property but only the title of manager of a religious endowment. <sup>(6)</sup> The power to transfer, is of course an incident of the office. Where, therefore, the manager is suspended or removed from office or is merely a disputed claimant to office <sup>(7)</sup> he cannot transfer any of the debutter land even for a justifiable necessity, though if the creditor was a bona fide transferee without notice, he would be necessarily protected. <sup>(8)</sup>

1957. The question what remedy the creditor has personally against the manager on failure of the security is one which cannot be answered without reference to the facts of each case, since the personal liability of the debtor must largely depend upon the representation, express and implied, that induced the loan. Prima facie the Swami of a xili has no private property and must be assumed to be pledging the credit of the malli when he borrows money for its purpose. Consequently the personal liability of the shebait in such a case is out of question and the malli would be liable if the loan is shown to have been contracted for the benefit of the malli or that the creditor had bona fide reason to suppose it was intended for such purpose. <sup>(9)</sup> But in any other case, where the manager has means of his own, he is bound by his contract, though the security he had offered failed. <sup>(10)</sup> But a debt so binding by estoppel cannot be recovered from his successors in the trust, though it might be available against his personal representatives. <sup>(11)</sup>

of the buildings constituting or comprised in the endowment,<sup>(1)</sup> there are heads of expenditure which are equally necessary, such as the cost of restoration of the image<sup>(2)</sup> the cost of litigation connected with the trust, defence of its title against hostile attack,<sup>(3)</sup> and the observance of customary practices such as the performance of the puja or worship with due ceremonies,<sup>(4)</sup> the distribution of cloth at a festival,<sup>(5)</sup> the constant burning of a lamp where so required<sup>(6)</sup> and the like.

1959. In judging of necessity, the first question is what is the character of the institution and what objects was the income derived therefrom to be devoted to. The question of necessity cannot be decided upon the analogy of other institutions. <sup>(7)</sup> Where no deed of endowment is forthcoming, the rules according to which property and its income are to be dealt with in order to carry out the intention of the original endower can only be ascertained by inference from the practice proved by evidence to have been followed in the particular case. But these rules, so to be inferred must not be inconsistent with or repugnant to the very nature and purpose of the endowment. If, for instance, the worship of the idol in the temple be intended to be perpetual as it could hardly fail to be, then the preservation and use of the dedicated property to support and maintain that worship must be assumed to have been similarly intended to be perpetual. A rule therefore which would authorize and empower the shebait of such temple arbitrarily and at his own mere will and pleasure to alienate the dedicated property, either piecemeal or enbloc would be so repugnant to the whole purpose and object of the endowment, that it could not be rationally held to embody the intention of the original founder. A shebait is not justified in selling debutter land solely for the purpose of raising capital to embark in money-lending business however lucrative that business may be. He is not entitled to sell debutter land solely for the purpose of so investing the purchase of it as to bring in an income larger than that derived from the probably safer and certainly more stable property, the debutter land itself. <sup>(8)</sup>

1960. A shebait is entitled to mortgage the endowed property to prevent its forfeiture or sale for non-payment of land revenue or other paramount charge.<sup>9</sup> So again where title to the "gaddi" was in dispute, expenses incurred in defending it were held chargeable on the endowment. <sup>(10)</sup>

Though the head of a muth possesses larger powers of disposition over its income, he has no larger authority to alienate the corpus than the head of any other religious institution. <sup>(11)</sup>

1961. The term "necessity" implies pressure. There may be a debt, a legal debt chargeable on the trust and yet no pressure. The manager cannot forecast wants and incumber the property which might otherwise have never been lost. So where there was a decree against a muth but no attachment, the court held a bond executed by the manager as supported by no necessity, adding: "It was given in respect of antecedent transactions, and there was no necessity for Sheocharan giving such a bond. There was no danger to the estate which the money was advanced for the sake of averting. The plaintiff might have sought any remedy which he had against the muth: but it does not appear that any proceedings were taken for sequestration or attachment of the property; and there was not therefore, any necessity for giving this bond and thus really giving a fresh right of suit, when as regards at least a portion of the claim, a suit for it would have been barred by the law of limitation (1)."

1962. Benefit.—Benefit as distinguished from necessity is a distinct and recognized head of expenditure permitted by law. As stated before, it was at one time classed under the head of necessity (§ 1072) from which it is however, clearly distinguishable (Ss. 97, 98). The term has already been generally defined (S. 98) and its application with reference to cases arising in connection with religious and charitable endowments is all that calls for notice here.

1963. What is benefit to an endowment must necessarily depend upon the nature and character of the endowment. For instance the construction of a Dharmasala to accommodate pilgrims visiting a shrine may be a "benefit" to the shrine though it would not justify its mortgage. On the other hand its mortgage to secure the repayment of money borrowed and applied to prevent its own extinction by sequestration would be a distinct benefit. (2) But the grant of a perpetual lease to fill up a tank on the property which the shebait could not afford to do, is not such benefit as would justify alienation of the trust property. (3)

1964. Partition.—An endowment is sometimes used in a dual sense as signifying the property dedicated to an object as also the object itself. Closely connected with the subject of endowment is that of the offices held by those entrusted with its management. A religious endowment would thus comprise (i) the property, (ii) the sacred object and (iii) the persons charged with the management of (a) the property and (b) the object. As regards the object and the sacred office, they are ordinarily both impartible, though in a family partition, even idols are known to have been thrown into the hotchpot and as regards religious offices, though they are strictly speaking indivisible, still modern custom has sanctioned a departure by permitting their partition by allowing the persons entitled to a share to officiate by turns, (4) but such partition is only allowed when (a) it is in accordance with the wishes and intentions of the founder of the endowment or (b) is justified by the usage or practice in the family. (5)

1965. Exchange.—The manager's right to effect an exchange of the dedicated property is of course to be tested by the same touchstone of necessity. If the property had deteriorated in value owing to the deposit of sand or other deleterious material or by the shifting course of a stream, an exchange would be prima facie justifiable. So again it may be justified by more economic management as where an outlying village is given away in exchange for another village more conveniently situated. The question in such case is not why there was an exchange, but whether it was necessary and conducive to the good of the endowment.

1966. Lease.—The manager's power to grant permanent leases must be measured by the same rule of necessity or benefit to the estate. Ordinarily, he has no power to grant permanent leases of endowed property. (1)

A permanent lease granted by the manager without necessity at fixed rent, though adequate at the time, was a breach of duty, and could, on the most favourable construction only enure for the life of the grantor and was not binding on his successors. (2) There is no presumption that the lease of debutter property is permanent though the rent was fixed. The presumption in favour of a permanent tenancy implies that there is ground for inferring that the tenure was always intended to be and always was hereditary, or that it acquired that character by subsequent grant. But a presumption in favour of a transaction assumes its regularity; it cannot be made in favour of that which offends legal principle. (3)

The fact that the lessee is itself a charitable institution does not validate an otherwise invalid lease. So it is immaterial that the site leased was a house site and yielded no rent and had been let at an unvarying rent on a fixed premium. (4)

A long lease for 40 years by a manager about to vacate office is open to the same objection as a permanent lease. (5)

A lease treated as permanent and acquiesced in by successive trustees cannot, however, be determined by notice. (6) But though the manager cannot without necessity grant permanent leases he is not debarred of his right as manager to grant leases for a reasonable term and create derivative tenures and estates in conformity with usage or as an act of ordinary prudent management. (7)

The general rule as to a manager applies equally to the Mahant of a muth who, though possessing larger power of internal management, has not the power to grant a permanent lease except for necessity or benefit of the institution. (8)

1967. Acquisition of endowed land.—Since a manager is not "competent to alienate the land" within the meaning of S. 13 of the Land Acquisition Act, it follows that the price payable on compulsory acquisition of land should be invested as provided in S. 32 of that Act. (9)

1968. Decree against manager binds the trust.—From the fact that the manager represents the trust in all suits affecting its interest, it follows that decrees fairly obtained by or against the manager as representative of the trust equally bind both his successor and the trust. But before applying the principle of res judicata to such judgments, the court should be satisfied, that the judgments relied upon are untainted by fraud or collusion, and that the necessary and proper issues have been raised, tried and decided in the suits which led to them and the execution of such judgments should be decreed only against the rents and profits of the debutter property <sup>(1)</sup> but this is not an invariable rule since if the rents and profits are inadequate to satisfy the decree, the corpus itself may be seized and sold. <sup>(2)</sup>

The trust estate is liable for a tort committed by its trustee in the reasonable management of the trust. <sup>(3)</sup>

1969. Manager's personal liability.—The fact that a person is the manager of a trust does not suspend his civil rights. He is able to contract in his own name and on his own credit and a decree obtained against him on his personal contract or security does not affect the trust <sup>(4)</sup> which is only liable for a debt contracted by him on its behalf and a decree passed against him as its representative.

1970. De facto manager.—The powers of a de facto and a de jure manager are the same <sup>(5)</sup> provided he is in actual possession. So where the plaintiff sued to recover on a bond given by the de facto manager of a muth as a charge on the muth, it appeared that the obligor had turned the manager out of possession and as his own right to possession was contested at the time he executed the bond, he was in no better position than a trespasser and a wrong doer and as such incompetent to represent the muth in its dealings with its creditors. <sup>(6)</sup>

1971. Shebait, Mahant, Dharmakarta.—The liability of the manager is not affected by the designation of his office. He may be a Mahant of a muth <sup>(7)</sup> or the shebait of a temple or a mere trustee of a charitable public trust, but in each case his right of alienation is subject to the same rule. <sup>(8)</sup>

1972. Setting aside improper alienation.—An improper alienation made by the manager being in breach of trust and in excess of his power, may be set aside by suit instituted by any one interested in the endowment. Where for instance it is a public religious endowment it may be set aside by suit instituted by any worshipper suing in the interest of his class. No sanction such as is provided for in S. 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure or S. 18 of the Religious Endowment Act is necessary to maintain it. (1) The same right belongs to all beneficiaries who sue only in the right of the trustee. They are his aliases and in England they are bound to use the name of the trustee as co-plaintiff. (2) On the alienation being set aside, the court should order delivery of possession of the alienated property to the trustee without driving the latter to a fresh suit for possession. For this purpose it is necessary that the trustee should also be impleaded in the suit as plaintiff if willing, otherwise a defendant. (3)

1973. Burden of proof.—Following the rule already stated before it has been laid down that it lies on him who sues to enforce an alienation made by a manager to prove both its factum and necessity. (4) But though this is the rule, the burden may be discharged by proof of the fact that successive holders of the office had recognised the validity of the alienation and acted upon that basis "and as time goes on this may itself come to be a not unimportant element of probabation upon the issue. It must also be fully borne in mind that with the lapse of time the parties to the transaction may die or disappear . . . and it is conceivable that, as years elapse, in such cases nearly all the material evidence may, in course of time, disappear while, the debt itself still remains, having from its initiation till almost the date of suit been recognised by all concerned as a debt truly constituted by the adynam. In such a case a court is much more easily satisfied that the debt was properly incurred than where the transaction was itself recent and can therefore be the subject of more exact evidence, or where the transaction, although remote, has been the subject of challenge or dispute by those charged with the interests of the institution." (1) The manager of a private endowment may transfer it with the consent of the founder or his whole family.

(2) In other cases, it may be relinquished if allowed by the terms of the foundation or usage, in favour of a member of the family or failing such member, a stranger eligible to discharge the duties of the office.

1974. Analogous Law.—The office of manager is ordinarily inalienable both because it is a sacred office and as such a res extra commercium as also because it is of a personal nature and the discharge of its duties requires personal qualifications. As such it was at one time held to be wholly inalienable and was exempt from seizure in execution of a decree against the shebait. (1) But since such offices are hereditary, the objection on the ground of personal fitness could not be pressed and with the right of heredity followed the right of partition. (2) The next stage was the qualified right of alienation to a member of the shebait's family (3) and failing him, to a stranger provided the stranger was fit to discharge the trust. (4) But the right is still such as cannot be attached in execution of a money decree against the shebait, since if such property be subject to attachment and sale the purchaser might be a Mahomedan or a Christian, who would be both unwilling and incompetent to perform the service of the idol (5) or prepare food for it. (6) Such a devolution would thus be not only destructive of the endowment but wholly inconsistent with the presumed intention of the founder. (7) The present law is thus a compromise between the ordinary rights of property and its special character. It permits sale within limits and those limits are stated in the section.

1975. Transfer of private endowment.—As regards a private endowment, the Privy Council stated that "the consensus of the whole family might give the estate another direction." (8)

CI. (1). The founder has, of course, the same right. The public are not interested in such endowment—the only persons interested are the founder and his family and it is for them to say who shall be its manager. It has been accordingly held that in a case of a private endowment, an alienation of the shebait's office made with the concurrence of the founder or of his whole family and for the benefit of the endowment is valid. (9) But consideration of benefit of the endowment was no part of the Privy Council dictum and does not appear to be an essential condition to its validity, though any transfer made to its detriment would doubtless be vetoed by the family. But it is their look out.

1976. What alienation allowed.—In the case of public endowments the alienation of shebaitship can only be permitted if authorized by the deed of foundation or usage. Even if so permitted the objections which apply to its attachment, equally apply to its transfer by treaty except to persons otherwise qualified to fill that office. In the case of heritable shebaitship, it may be transferred to one in the line of heirs, but if no such heir exists, its transfer is permitted even to a qualified stranger. But such alienations are in the nature of exceptions <sup>(1)</sup> and tolerated on the ground that they are in the end in the interest of the endowment. Strictly speaking they should be wholly inalienable. As was observed: "The duties to be performed are the protection of this property devoted by the piety of former ages to the service of religion against all invaders and especially against the invasion of the powerful. The property itself is, by the principles of all law, that of no individual whatever. A trustee cannot by any act of his own denude himself of his character of trustee until he has performed his trust. It is manifest that where the trust is one of perpetual obligation, where the cestui que trusts are the whole Hindu community and where the property is res extra commercium, in no sense the subject either of bargain or sale, and if not of sale, then not of gift, the attempt of trustees to surrender the trust property and thus throw out their character would not only be a gross breach of trust, but would be quite powerless to vest any rights in the persons in whose favour they had committed such breach of trust." <sup>(2)</sup>

1977. This question was considered by the Privy Council in 1877 in an appeal arising out of a suit in which the plaintiff claimed to manage a Pagoda by his right of assignment from the authorized trustees. The courts in India dismissed the claim and in affirming their decision the Privy Council said that the plaintiff's assignors had no power, under what may be termed the common law of India, to transfer the trust. <sup>(3)</sup> At the same time they conceded that such transfer would be possible if sanctioned by usage adding however, "that if the custom set up was one to sanction not merely the transfer of a trusteeship, but as in this case, the sale of a trusteeship for the pecuniary advantage of the trustee, they would be disposed to hold that the circumstance alone would justify a decision that the custom was bad in law." <sup>(4)</sup> This case narrowed down the scope of alienation by excluding therefrom all alienations not warranted by the foundation or custom. <sup>(5)</sup> Even the assignor could sue to recover back the trust he had no right to assign. <sup>(6)</sup> That custom has broken in upon the inviolability of the sacred office will be clear from the decided cases. <sup>(7)</sup> So custom may permit the assignment of a right to receive offerings <sup>(8)</sup> or a turn of worship <sup>(9)</sup> though they are ordinarily unassignable.

courts will not enforce any custom which permits trafficking in sacred offices. (1) It is only in a special case that alienation of such office is permitted and he who relies upon it must make out a case for its validity. A transfer which is a sale of such office (2) or one which is intended, or will have, the effect of altering the form of worship cannot be permitted. (3)

1979. Since the manager is entitled to represent the trust in all suits relating to it, a decree obtained against him as representing the trust will bind it in the hands of his successor, unless the decree was obtained by the collusion or fraud of the manager. (4) The binding nature of the decree in such cases is not affected by the fact that it is based on a compromise.

1980. So again since the manager has the possessory title, adverse possession against him is adverse possession against the trust (5) and possession adverse against one co-shebaite is equally adverse against all (6) including their successors. (7) So where on the death of a Mahant his two chelas struggled for that office, but compromised their dispute by an agreement by which each chela was allotted a muth separately, it was held that the possession of one was adverse to the other and to the idol to which the two muths belonged. (8) In another case it was contended that where successive managers succeed to the trust, independently of each other and not by any right derived from the founder, possession adverse against one could not be adverse against his successor. (9) Such was the grant made to one Balobha and his descendants. His estate including this grant was divided by his sons, and the share of Vithoba, one of them was illegally seized and sold in execution in 1870. The sons of another son of Balobha by some process became possessed of this share. Vithoba died in 1876 and in 1879 his son sued the other descendants of Balobha for a third share of the management. The defence was that under the Limitation Act, a suit to set aside an execution sale must have been brought within a year from the conclusion of the sale. The court held that where the founder of an endowment had vested in a certain family, the management of it, "each member of such family succeeds to the management, to use technical language, per formam doni" and that therefore on Vithoba's death the plaintiff's right to succeed to the management was quite unaffected by any proceedings against Vithoba during his life. (10) But this view was overruled by the Privy Council who held that the creation of successive life-estates was inconsistent with the Hindu Law of inheritance and therefore void. (1)

1981. Muths: Their origin and history.—A considerable portion of endowed property is held by the institutions—called muths or monasteries, a term which in its original and narrow sense signified the abode of an ascetic or Sanyasi or Paradesi. (2) In ancient India religious learning was imparted by a teacher drawing to himself a number of disciples who lived and learnt with his guru who gave them shelter. These congregations of tutor and students lived the life of a religious family. At times a number of Rishis foregathered in an improvised shelter where they taught their students. These were the prototypes of colleges and monasteries. With the rise of Buddhism these institutions received a considerable stimulus born of a new faith with its levelling doctrines and proselytizing vigour. Congregations of monks were formed to preach and practise its sublime philosophy. These monasteries offered welcome refuge to those who desired to escape the turmoils and troubles of worldly life. They were the rendezvous alike of the elite of the faith as of the bereaved and distressed souls from all claim. Whatever tempest may rage without, within their walls was peace. The rising power of the doctrine of Nirvan aroused the Brahman hierophants from their accustomed lethargy. In the eighth century Shankar, an orthodox Hindu scholar rose to re-establish the ancient faith. Shankar was an ascetic and inculcated asceticism as the best antidote to the new fangled creed. Like the Buddhists he too established monasteries and founded the order of Sanyasis called Aranyas, Asramas, Banas, Bhartis, Parbatas, Puris, Sagaras, Saraswatis, and Tirthas who lived in muths where they took and taught disciples. The head of these muths was called the Mahant or Acharya.

1982. In the internal administration of the muth the Mahant was paramount. In course of time these muths became the favoured objects of pious gifts and bequests, till their growing opulence emulated other teachers who started other muths which began to be quickly multiplied. "A preceptor of religious doctrine gathers around him a number of disciples whom he initiates into the particular mysteries of the order and instructs in its religious tenets. Such of these disciples as intend to become religious teachers renounce their connection with their family and all claims to the family wealth, and as it were, affiliate themselves to the spiritual teacher whose schools they have entered. Pious persons endow the schools with property which is vested in the preceptor for the time being and a home for the school is erected and mattam constituted. The property of the mattam does not descend to the disciples or elders in common; the preceptor, the head of the institution, selects among the affiliated disciples him whom he deems most competent and in his own life-time installs the disciple so selected as his successor, not uncommonly with some ceremonies. After the death of the preceptor the disciple so chosen is installed in the gaddi and takes by succession the property which has been held by his predecessor. The property is in fact attached to the office and passes by inheritance to no one who does not fill the office. It is in a certain sense trust property; it is devoted to the maintenance of the establishment but the superior has large dominion over it and is not accountable for its management nor for the expenditure of the income, provided he does not apply it to any purpose other than what may fairly be regarded as in furtherance of the objects of the institution." 1983. Though all Hindu muths contain idols, still the worship of idols is quite a secondary matter, its primary object being the maintenance, in circumstances likely to command due respect and estimation, of a line of competent religious teachers, who as already shown, are given for the welfare of the foundation itself, a real and, so to speak, beneficial interest in the usufruct, the restrictions governing the disposition whereof by them being of the nature of a mere moral obligation."<sup>(1)</sup> But in so far as the muths were treated as a departure from the normal rule applicable to all religious endowments <sup>(2)</sup> the view of the Madras Court has been overruled by the Privy Council in a case decided on the following facts. The Mahant of a muth of Astal Patepur in the Mozufferpur district who had been its Mahant from 1866 to 1897 resigned appointing his brother's son Rampertab in his place. The plaintiff who was his senior chela disputed the legality of his appointment contending that by the usage of the muth the senior chela had the right of succession. The defendant supported his nomination on the strength of the decided cases <sup>(3)</sup> which recognized the right of the Mahant to nominate his successor but the Privy Council held such statement to be too general, adding, "Such questions in India are not settled by an appeal to general customary law; the usage of the particular muth stands as the law therefor."<sup>(4)</sup> In other words, the question is one of fact and not of law. As to Rampertab, their Lordships held that being married and having had a son born to him after he became the Mahant, he was wholly ineligible in that it was inconsistent with the holding of an important sacred office. A married man might be selected to that office but "initiation of a married man must be preceded by the entire and permanent separation from his wife and by the giving up of all worldly ties."<sup>(5)</sup> And as to his brother Bhagwat, since he was appointed by Rampertab who was himself incompetent, he was equally ineligible. There remained the ex-mahant Anand Das himself. He was aged 80, had abdicated all his functions and he admitted that his position was no more than that of any worshipper. "The Mahant in their Lordships' opinion is not only a spiritual preceptor but also a trustee in respect of the asthal over which he presides." There remained the plaintiff whose claim by reason of his being the senior chela remained and had not been denied, failing an appointment by the late Mahant. He was accordingly declared as the rightful Mahant in succession to Anand Das. <sup>(6)</sup>

1984. The position of the Mahant must then be now settled to be as follows: "The whole assets (of the muth) are vested in him as the owner thereof in trust for the institution itself."<sup>(7)</sup> "The nature of the ownership is...an ownership in trust for the muth or institution itself, and it must not be forgotten that although large administrative powers are undoubtedly vested in the reigning Mahant, the trust does exist and must be respected."<sup>(8)</sup> "The Mahant in their Lordships' opinion is not only a spiritual preceptor, but also a trustee in respect of the muth over which he presides." (1) Adverting to this case a Madras Bench held it to be a "considered pronouncement as to the position of the head of a muth, as to his functions and his legal position with regard to the endowments." (2) In the absence of custom, a Mahant of a muth cannot transfer the right of management vested in him, though coupled with the obligation to manage in conformity with the trust annexed thereto. (3)

(2) In Vidyapurna v. Vidyamidhi, 27 M. 485 (437) Bhashyam Ayyangar, J., compared the position of the head of a muth to a corporation sole, adding that "as in the case of a bishopric, perpetual succession in a muth is secured by the provision for nomination of a successor." But in view of the latest pronouncement of the Privy Council, this view must stand modified.

1985. There is no fixed rule which regulates the relation between a superior and a subordinate muth; even if a muth is subordinate to another, it must be governed by its own rules of management. (4)

1986. But though a Mahant does not as a matter of common law and apart from special usage, possess the power of appointment, he is entitled to appoint a deputy who may in due course succeed to him. (5) It has already been stated that a muth like an idol is a juridical person capable of acquiring, holding and vindicating legal rights though of necessity it can only act in relation to those rights through the medium of some human agency. In connection with the property of a muth there are two distinct classes of suits, those in which the manager seeks to enforce his private and personal rights and those in which he seeks to vindicate the rights of the muth. The rights of the muth cannot ordinarily be prejudiced by the result of a suit of the former class. (6) The head of a muth may contract debts for the purpose of the muth, and debts so contracted may be recovered from the muth property, and will devolve as a liability on his successor to the extent of the assets received by him. But the head of a muth cannot pledge its credit for debts contracted for its purposes without necessity and without reference to the question whether they should have been met from current income. In this respect the head of a muth does not possess larger powers than the heads of other religious institutions whose powers are, as previously stated, analogous to those of the manager for an infant heir. (7)

1987. Succession to mahantship.—It is now settled that the position of a mahant in relation to the muth over which he presides is that of a trustee and not of an owner (8) though he possesses larger powers of internal management. But being the trustee, he has no right to appoint a successor and the question of succession to him must be governed by the particular usage of the institution and in fact, the general law. If, by the practice and usage of an institution, the mahant is entitled to nominate a successor, the courts will give effect to it. (9) The mahant cannot appoint a successor by a will (10) though he may be authorised by usage to appoint a successor (11) but that "usage forms the controlling rule with regard to the right to the office of mahant may now be considered as having been conclusively settled by authority." (1) But while it is so, usage generally leans towards the succession of the senior chela as the rightful successor and where there is no evidence of any usage to the contrary, the court will be justified in presuming such usage to govern the succession. (2) In many muths the mahant is elected by the Sanyasis of the muths of his order and in the absence of custom and the power of appointment, this should be presumed to be the rule of election. (3)

It has been held as proved that the mahant of the muths of the Nanak Shahi Udasi sect possesses the power to nominate his own successor. (4)

1988. Gossains and Sanyasis.—The orthodox Hindu muths are tenanted by Gossains, Sanyasis, Bairagis or ascetics of other sects who are drawn from the Hindu society without distinction of caste, every Hindu being competent to enter a religious order. In the case of Dasnami Gossavis or Sanyasis, the initiation is performed as follows:—When a person intends to enter the sect, some ordinary ceremonies are performed such as the shaving of the head, bathing of the body, wearing of new clothes and the assumption of a new name upon which he becomes a novitiate Gossavi in which state he continues for a year or two during which he is expected to make himself familiar with the rights, customs and usages of the order. Often during this period of probation the novice is initiated into the ceremony of Biraj Home which consists in whispering into his ears the mulmantra or the mystic formula which converts the novice into a chela. During the period of probation it is open to the novice to renounce the life of the monastery and return to secular life but after the performance of Biraj Home he cannot return to it. This ceremony is not performed till the probationer attains the age of discretion so as to be able to realize for himself the full significance of the final act of renunciation of the world. The ceremony of Biraj Home is performed on an auspicious day and its performance completes the affiliation of the chela to his guru. (5) Biraj Home ceremony requires that the novice should have attained the years of discretion which according to Hindu Law implies the completion of the 16th year. (6)

Manager's duties.

218. The manager of an endowment is charged with the following duties:—

(1) He must carry out the founder's directions, if any, as to the management of the property.

(2) He must maintain the customary usages of the institution.

(3) He is entitled to the possession of all endowed property; and as shebait, he is entitled to the custody of the idol and all its paraphernalia.

1989. Analogous Law.—All the clauses of this section are drawn from the decided cases. (1) The duties of manager must depend upon the nature of the endowment. If it is charitable without being religious, the manager has merely to administer the fund in accordance with the wishes of the founder or the general purpose of the foundation. Where, however, the trust is religious the manager's duties are more artificial and must conform to the forms and rituals if any, prescribed or usual in such cases. For the rest, his duties are in conformity with the general law (2) and will now be considered.

1990. Founder's directions.—This clause is in consonance with the general rule enacted in S. 11 of the Trusts Act which requires the trustee to fulfil the purpose of the trust, and to obey the directions of the author of the trust given at the time of its creation except as modified by the beneficiaries being competent to contract, provided that where the beneficiaries are incompetent to contract, the directions of the District Judge should be taken, and the trustee is not bound to obey any direction which is impracticable, illegal or manifestly injurious to the beneficiaries. Under S. 43 of the Religious Endowment Act (3) and S. 34 of the Trusts Act it is open to the manager to take the advice of the court on any question respecting the management or administration of the trust property. The trustee is not bound to carry out the details of his instructions, since his position as trustee arms him with a certain discretion in the interest of the trust property. Where therefore, he has acted erroneously but honestly according to his best judgment in the interest of the trust, the court will not too narrowly canvass the matter in which he has overborne his instructions.

1991. Manager's general powers.—In the first place, a manager must be distinguished from a superintendent <sup>(1)</sup> or other officer in whom the trust does not vest, but who is merely to supervise the work of the manager. <sup>(2)</sup> Such officer performs his prescribed duties but has neither the rights nor is liable to perform the duties of manager. Then again the manager of the trust properties as such, must be distinguished from the manager of the temple-service and ceremonies which he performs according to the customary ritual. As manager of the properties he is trustee for the endowment and his general rights and duties are those of a trustee. Where the management vests in more than one person jointly, they must all act jointly.

1992. It is competent for co-trustees to settle a scheme of management by each of the co-trustees in rotation, at any rate, where no emoluments are attached and the office is an hereditary one. Where emoluments are attached and the office is hereditary, the emoluments will be subject to partition in the strict sense of the term, like any other family property. But whatever may be the number of co-trustees, the office is a joint one and the co-trustees all form, as it were, but one collective trustee, and therefore must execute the duties of the office in their joint capacity. <sup>(3)</sup> The manager of a temple fills a double role. "As regards the property, the manager is in the position of a trustee. But as regards the service of the temple and the duties that appertain to it, he is rather in the position of the holder of an office or dignity which may have been originally conferred on a single individual, but which, in course of time has become vested by descent in more than one person. In such a case, in order to avoid confusion or an unseemly scramble, it is not unusual and it is certainly not improper, for the parties interested to arrange among themselves for the due execution of the functions belonging to the office in turn or in some settled order and sequence. There is no breach of trust in such arrangement nor any improper delegation of the duties of a trustee."<sup>(4)</sup>

1993. Such arrangement however creates no right, but is supported on the ground of convenience and may be at any time revoked by all the co-trustees <sup>(5)</sup> though it could not be varied or revoked by any one of them as inconvenient to himself. Any co-trustee may enforce the agreement against any one obstructing him in his right. <sup>(6)</sup> A decision by the majority is binding on the minority when it is arrived at after full opportunity given for mutual discussion by all the members in which the minority had an opportunity to record their dissent. <sup>(7)</sup>

In the case of private or family idols which have no local habitation, such as a temple, it is open to the co-trustee to remove them to another house for the period of his turn <sup>(8)</sup> but he must return them at his own expense to the next turn owner.

1994. The general duty of the manager is to take that reasonable care in the management of the trust which a prudent person under similar circumstances would take of his own property. (1)

But though this is the ideal, mismanagement of Hindu endowments by their managers is a byword of reproach. In a majority of cases the terms of the grant are extremely vague—in other cases, they are not even traceable, while in most cases they follow a traditional practice. As remarked by West and Buhler: "The idol, deity or the religious object is looked on as a kind of human entity and the successive officiators in worship as a corporation with rights of enjoyment but not generally of partition or alienation, except so far as this may be necessary to prevent greater injury. Such endowments are frequently founded by gifts and bequests simply to the institution. No rules have, in a majority of these cases, been formally prescribed. The intention of the foundation has to be gathered from the traditional practice and the succession is thus determined by the custom of each particular institution, though this may have become embraced in some more extensive custom. And as to the management of an endowment, it is not competent for the holders in one generation to impose rules on those of another. The endowment once made cannot be resumed, but performance of the duties may be enforced." (2)

1995. Worshippers' right.—In the case of a public religious trust, it is the right of every worshipper and devotee of the temple to enter the shrine for the purpose of worship. They cannot be refused admission without just cause. (3)

 mary usages of the foundation. As observed by the Privy Council: "It is the duty of the trustee or manager to maintain the customary usages of the institution and if he fails to do so he is . . . . guilty of a breach of trust and still more so, if he deliberately attempts to effect a vital change of usage and make it binding on the worshippers by obtaining a decree of the court to establish it." (4) In the case of temples, the endowments, whether in the shape of landed property or tasdik allowances, have to be devoted to the carrying out of the specific purposes connected with the temples, i.e., the daily worship and the periodical ceremonies and festivals, purposes defined and settled by usage and custom and generally recorded in what is known as the 'dittam' and the dharmkirtas are mere trustees for the carrying out or the executing of such trusts. In the case of muths, however, such defined and specific purposes immediately connected with the maintenance of the muth as an institution, are in the nature of things very limited and a large part of the income derived from the endowments of the muth as well as from the money offerings of its disciples and followers—which offerings as a rule are very considerable—is at the disposal of the head of the muth for the time being which he is expected to spend at his will and pleasure, on objects of religious charity and in the encouragement and promotion of religious learning. His obligation to devote the surplus income to such religious and charitable objects is one in the nature only of an imperfect or moral obligation resting in his conscience, regulated only by the force of public opinion and he is in no way, whether as a trustee or otherwise, accountable for it in law. (5)

1997. The customary usages must necessarily differ according to the nature and purpose of the foundation. If it is a temple, the ordinary usage consists in preparing food (called bhog) for the deity, celebrate certain festivals, arrange for fairs <sup>(1)</sup> and collect votive offerings. If he neglects to perform his usual and customary duties or is guilty of malversation or misconduct in the performance of them the court will restrain him. Such would be the case where the manager refused to perform the usual festivals though he was in funds. A fortiori would he be guilty of such misconduct if it was usual to celebrate them with the aid of voluntary contributions. "And of course, the courts are bound to restrain a trustee from injuring the institution under his charge by corruptly, arbitrarily or wantonly departing from the ordinary course of procedure in regard to essential or important matters connected with the institution. That such departure on the part of a trustee amounts to a breach of legal duty incumbent on him is the ground on which the court exercises jurisdiction over him." <sup>(2)</sup> The manager must conform to the usage. He cannot alter it. He cannot alter the form of worship <sup>(3)</sup> or the ceremonies and processions in connection with idols. <sup>(4)</sup> But of course, in this as in all other matters, they must be guided by public opinion.

1998. The manager of a public temple cannot make rules preventing free admission of every worshipper thereto for the purposes of worship. Nor can he levy an admission fee though he may regulate admission to a particular part owing to the value of the idol and its ornaments. <sup>(5)</sup> In this and other matters of detail, the manager doubtless possesses a power which must be exercised not capriciously but only in good faith on necessary occasions and for necessary and legal purposes as for preserving orderliness and decency of worship.

1999. Possession of the endowment.—The manager has the sole right to be in possession of the endowment, the idols, its jewels and other paraphernalia. Where there are several trustees, they are allowed to partition the endowment for convenience of management. And where they have equal right of worship, they are permitted to exercise it by rotation. They may even remove the idol if it has no local habitation for the period of their turn, but on condition that they deliver it at their own expense to the owner of the next turn. But this is an exception and not the rule, since idols ordinarily gain in sanctity by the reason of their locality and where they have for long remained in a place it becomes their abode from which they cannot be removed.

2000. The right of the manager to superintend the work of all servants employed on the foundation arises from the very nature of his office as manager. He is entitled to punish and dismiss all servants including the hereditary priest for misconduct <sup>(6)</sup> and unless the dismissal is malicious or mala fide the civil court has no jurisdiction to review his decision <sup>(7)</sup> unless he can shew that there was a trust in his favour. <sup>(8)</sup> In any case the fact that the servant was dismissed without notice given or explanation taken is no ground for interference. "The nature of the office may be such that instant suspension from the functions of the office would be necessary in the interests of the institution and to hold that the officer could not be suspended without notice and without explanation received from him, might be seriously detrimental to the interests of the temple" (1).

2001. The possession of the manager being qua trustee, cannot be adverse to the beneficiaries. In determining what right adverse possession would confer on the holder, the animus possidendi is the decisive factor. The character in which possession is held must determine the right which the possession would confer. The fact that the trustee was misappropriating the rents would not make his possession adverse, though it would make him liable to account for the rents so misappropriated. The plaintiff's father as trustee had let certain temple lands to the defendant. The plaintiff sued to recover them. It was proved that the trust had vested in another. The plaintiff had, however, received rents of the land and appropriated them to his own use. He claimed the lands by adverse possession. But the court dismissed his suit holding that the land belonged to a trust and could not be recovered by the plaintiff who was the trustee, however wrongfully he may have used its rents. (2)

2002. Must keep accounts.—The manager must maintain accounts even if he be himself the founder. (3) His failure to keep accounts is a grave misconduct justifying his removal. (4) It is the manager's duty to protect and preserve the endowment, to manage it prudently and to conserve its resources with scrupulous care. It is his duty to take stock of all the dedicated property, realize bud securites before they are lost. (5) If his predecessor has wrongly alienated any of the properties it is his duty to recover them before they become irrecoverable and if by his fraud or negligence any of the properties are lost he is liable for it. (6) All surplus must be promptly invested in sound securities, otherwise he will be liable for interest. (7) He may invest in any securities provided they are of a permanent and not perishable or terminable nature. (8)

2003. The manager must not mix the trust accounts with his own since it leads to confusion. If he contravenes this rule and mixes trust money with his own and the two cannot be separated, the trust will be entitled to the whole. (9)

The manager's salary is sometimes fixed, but in many cases he is left to make what he can out of it. In such case it is difficult to call him to account, for he is accountable to no one. Such is ordinarily the position of the Mahant of a muth. (10) Wherever he is accountable at all, his liability will be determined by the rules here stated.

2004. The manager is entitled to receive votive offerings which he must credit in his accounts. "Where an idol is set up temporarily for worship or where the offerings are of a perishable nature, such as articles of food, the priest in attendance, as the nearest Brahmin available, generally appropriates the offerings; and the same is the case where the idol itself is the private property of the priest. But where, the idol is an ancient one permanently established for public worship, and the offerings are generally of a more or less permanent character, being coins and other metallic articles, in the absence of any custom or express declaration by the donor to the contrary, they are as they ought to be, taken to be intended to contribute to the maintenance of the shrine with all its rites, ceremonies and charities and not to become the personal property of the priest. However much a Hindu votary may wish that his offerings to public shrines should ultimately go to the use of meritorious Brahmins, he can never be supposed to intend, nor does the Hindu Law, anywhere allow, that they should become the property of the priest, to be squandered by him or devoted to purposes foreign to the endowment." (1)

A Mahant of a muth is however entitled to retain all votive offerings subject only to the burden of maintaining the muth. (2)

2005. His right of suit.—The manager is entitled to sue on behalf of the endowment as its guardian or next friend, and he may be sued as such. (3) In some cases the manager is held entitled to sue and be sued in his own name without the idol being joined as the party interested. (4) This procedure is at variance with the general principles said to be supported by practice. But there seems nothing to commend it.

Since an idol is a juristic person in minority, the manager suing for an idol is entitled to the extension allowed by S. 6 (old S. 7) of the Limitation Act. (5)

2006. Persons interested as worshippers in a public religious endowment may be added as parties to a suit instituted by a trustee on behalf of the endowment against third parties if such joinder is considered by the court as desirable in the interests of the trust. (6) Such an occasion was held to arise where the worshippers complained of a breach of trust by the manager who had colluded with the other side to the prejudice of their right of worship. (7) As S. 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure deals only with immoveable property, the court may declare the possession of a temple, but can pass no order as to the offerings (8) or of the right to act as priest. 2007. The manager cannot enter into a valid compromise binding upon his successor unless it is shown to have been entered into for the benefit of the endowment. <sup>(1)</sup> The manager cannot settle the right to his office by compromise, since, while a party may settle by compromise a matter of a private individual right, he cannot so settle a right which is not purely of a private civil character. A right in which the public are interested will not be permitted to be adjusted by arbitration or compromise. "The court itself has certain duties in connection with a case in which a judgment in rem has to be pronounced or in a case which involves the right of the public or the right to a religious and charitable office or the right of a minor or other incapacitated person." <sup>(2)</sup> An agreement or compromise affecting such right is not a lawful agreement or compromise. <sup>(3)</sup> A decree even if passed on such compromise will not bind the public whose rights are affected only by decrees passed upon their merits. <sup>(4)</sup> But the rule has no application to cases in which the public rights are not infringed.

For instance it is competent to the shebait to compromise a suit in respect of the debutter property and such compromise will bind his successor in office if made in the interest of the endowment. <sup>(5)</sup>

2008. The manager is entitled to be reimbursed the expense which he has incurred in carrying out the directions of the testator, or otherwise on objects of necessity. The right of indemnity is incident to the position of a trustee. The liability in respect of that indemnity is the first charge on the trust estate. So where one Bejay succeeded his father as shebait of a religious trust and his right was contested by one Peary who obstructed Bejay's possession with the result that its income calculated at Rs. 10,000 a year fell to less than a moiety. Bejay defended his title and spent Rs. 71,572 and out of his private funds in protecting the debutter estate and performing his obligations as shebait. It was held that the estate was liable to indemnify Bejay for the amount spent by him in defending his own title as shebait and in protecting the estate and carrying out the directions of the founder's will. <sup>(6)</sup>

Removal of manager.

219. A manager may be removed from his office for such misconduct as is incompatible with the interest of the endowment.

2009. Analogous Law.—The removal of the manager from his office depends upon the terms and condition of the foundation and the nature of the manager's misconduct. Where the foundation is a family temple, members of the family arrange among themselves for its management. Where the foundation is a public trust the court wields sufficient jurisdiction and control over its management. In such case it has to examine the principles which should guide it in sanctioning the dismissal of the manager. It has been held that a mere non-feasance is wholly insufficient to justify his removal. The fact that he took no interest in the welfare of the temple or had mistaken the scope of his duties and sanctioned expenditure in payment of fines and costs of trustees of his own sect, or had taken part in faction fights are not such non-feasances for which he can be removed <sup>(1)</sup> unless his neglect has led the buildings of the institution to fall into decay. <sup>(2)</sup> A manager cannot be punished with dismissal for his mistake or error of judgment though the court will give directions for better management in future. <sup>(3)</sup> Nothing short of fraud or dishonesty will move the court to remove him <sup>(4)</sup> even though his office be hereditary. <sup>(5)</sup> Failure on the part of the manager to keep or submit accounts to the committee is a breach of one of the most important duties cast upon him by law and is sufficient to justify his dismissal. <sup>(6)</sup>

2010. So is the fact that the manager had continuously misused the income of the endowment. <sup>(7)</sup> A manager wrongly dismissed from his office is entitled to damages for his wrongful dismissal. When a temple trustee had been given notice by the temple committee of some or all of the charges against him and one of them drew up a report suggesting the trustee's suspension pending further orders and the other members except one agreed, it was held that the action of the committee was ultra vires and that the trustee was entitled to damages against his corporators who were parties to his wrongful removal from office. <sup>(8)</sup>

2011. The lunacy of the Mahant of a muth does not, it is said, disqualify him to continue as its head though it would be a ground for appointing a substitute to carry on his duties during the continuance of his disability. <sup>(9)</sup> But immorality, marriage <sup>(10)</sup> and incontinence is quite another matter. It is a misconduct for which the head of any religious foundation will be thrown out.

2012. So Lord Shaw referring to the qualifications essential to the Mahant of a muth said: "The nomination must fall upon one who is competent to hold his important sacred office. For instance, the person chosen may be disqualified by reason of bodily deformity, or bodily disease such as leprosy, or disease of the mind, or of the leading of a life which is immoral or is inconsistent with the religious vows of the brotherhood. In all such cases the nomination would be void. Among these disqualifications stands the contracting of a marriage and the begetting of children. As already mentioned, initiation of a married man must be preceded by the entire and permanent separation from his wife and by the giving up of all worldly ties." But their Lordships were considering the case of appointment and not one of removal; and the two do not stand on a par. But that immorality would disqualify the manager of a religious endowment from holding office cannot for a moment be doubted. And it has been so held. (1) But immorality has not the effect of causing forfeiture. The manager must be removed. (2) Of course a manager cannot be called to account, if he is not by the terms of his appointment, liable to maintain or render any account. (3)

2013. Nor again, can the manager be removed from office because he had, following in the wake of his predecessors, considered himself as owner of the estate. This is a case in which the court should overlook the past and provide against the future by settling a scheme of management. (4) So again a party holding land assigned for the support of an idol subject to the performance of the ceremonies or worship of the idol, who fails to perform the required service cannot be summarily removed without being given the option to continue the worship. (5) A deposition of the shebait by a foreign state, i.e., the Maharaja of Odaipur has no effect upon his management of properties situate in British India. (6)

2014. Procedure for removal.—The procedure for the removal of the manager must depend upon the terms and nature of his appointment. If he was appointed by the brotherhood, those who possess the power of appointment presumably possess also the power of dismissal. But then both the appointment and the dismissal must be in consonance with fair play and justice decided upon in a meeting convoked for the purpose in which all members are consulted and the decision arrived at according to the opinions of the majority. Where therefore the brotherhood of Samub Bhakts removed their high priest by convening a meeting in which only those favouring his dismissal were present, it was held that the dismissal was improper in that there had been no convocation of all of the brotherhood after sufficient notice and proclamation in which the opinion of the assembly was taken or considered. To validate the removal of a high priest from his office by a majority of a religious brotherhood, it is necessary, first to ascertain the voters and their qualifications, secondly to determine whether steps have been taken to enable the brotherhood to express their decision and thirdly to determine whether a majority have expressed their wish in favour of removal. The qualifications of voters may depend upon membership of the brotherhood, age, sex and residence. A question may also arise whether a member or family is the unit for this purpose. The decision of the majority must be determined by reference to votes given at the meeting and cannot be made to depend upon views indicated subsequently in the course of a suit brought to contest the validity of the removal. Whether a quorum is necessary to legalize the decision of the meeting must depend upon the custom of the brotherhood in the absence of statutory provision or express direction in that behalf by the founder. (7)

Synopsis.

- (1) Rights of beneficiaries (2015). (3) Private endowments (2017-2019).
 (2) Who are beneficiaries (2016).

2015. Analogous Law.—Generally speaking the beneficiaries to an endowment may be an idol, a muth or other juristic person or a body of men. In either case they are the direct beneficiaries. But in the former case, worshippers and devotees are equally regarded as beneficiaries if they have the right of offering their devotion and worship to the deity. (1) As such they are interested in its preservation and maintenance, and for that purpose they are entitled to complain of any improper alienation of property. (2) Again since the founder and his family are primarily interested in the maintenance of their endowment, they have the same right of worship and protection of the endowed property. (3) The term "founder" comprises not only the sole founder but also a joint contributor to the endowment. (4)

2016. The nature of the benefit accruing from an endowment must depend upon its nature and character. Persons who are residents of the locality in which a choultry is situated and are members of the community for whose benefit the choultry was founded are sufficiently interested to be able to maintain a suit under S. 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure. (5) Any person to be benefited by the execution of a trust is a beneficiary entitled to sue for its protection. So where a choultrie was founded for the feeding of people, especially Brahmins, a suit by a resident Brahmin was held to be maintainable though the Brahmins to be fed were ordinarily Japtas or travellers. 2017. If it is an endowment created for the worship of an idol, the question whether the public are entitled to free access for worship depends again upon the nature and character of the idol. If it is the idol of a particular sect or caste, only persons belonging to that sect or caste are entitled to free access <sup>(1)</sup> and others have no such right. Even a person ordinarily entitled to access may forfeit his right if he offends against the rules of the caste entailing his suspension or excommunication. <sup>(2)</sup> So it is a question of usage whether a dancing girl or a man who has married a widow, should be admitted into a temple. <sup>(3)</sup>

2018. It has already been stated before, that the manager has no right to levy a fee for admission. All he is entitled to is to make such rules as to the time and order of worship for the sake of orderliness and decency of worship. <sup>(4)</sup>

The right of access is possessed by each person separately though it may be possessed by a class of persons conjointly. Such for instance would be the right of a sect to proceed to a temple in procession for worship.

2019. Private endowments excepted.—The public have naturally no right of access to worship private deities. Nor can they complain of any malversation or misconduct on the part of their manager.

Statutory control. 221. Public, religious and charitable endowments are subject to the following statutory control.

(1) Any two or more persons interested therein may maintain a suit in accordance with the procedure prescribed in S. 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908.

(2) And any person so interested may sue alone in a case arising under the Religious Endowments Act, 1863.

(3) Such suit does not affect a suit otherwise maintainable.

2020. Analogous Law.—The two acts of the Indian Legislature dealing with religious and charitable endowments are the Religious Endowments Act, 1863 <sup>(1)</sup> and the Code of Civil Procedure.

The Bengal Regulation XIX of 1810 vested in the Board of Revenue and commissioners, the general superintendence of all lands granted for the support of mosques, temples, colleges, and for other pious and beneficial purposes, and of all public buildings, such as bridges, serais, Katras (market places) and other edifices.

2021. The Madras Regulation VII of 1817 similarly vested in the Madras Board of Revenue all endowments granted for the support of colleges, or for other beneficial purposes and of all public buildings, such as bridges, choultries <sup>(2)</sup> or chuttrums. <sup>(3)</sup>

2022. In the presidency towns the same power was possessed by the Supreme Courts which passed to their successors, the High Courts. So far as the Regulations referred to religious endowments, they were repealed and replaced by the Religious Endowments Act, 1863 <sup>(4)</sup> which is in force throughout British India, outside the Presidency towns, <sup>(5)</sup> and the Bombay Presidency except North Canara <sup>(6)</sup> and the Central Provinces. <sup>(7)</sup> The Regulations still continue to apply to charitable endowments.

2023. This Act nowhere applies to private endowments <sup>(12)</sup> and it only applies to public endowments in which "the nomination of the trustee, manager or superintendent thereof, at the time of the passing of the Act is vested in, or may be exercised by the Government or any public officer, or in which the nomination of such trustee, manager or superintendent" is subject to the confirmation of Government or any public officer. <sup>(13)</sup>

The Act was enacted in pursuance of the policy of religious neutrality. <sup>(8)</sup>

2025. The scheme of the Act is as follows :—

(1) Charitable endowments remain unaffected by it.

(2) As regards religious endowments, only those as had previously been under the control of the Boards of Revenue are brought under its scheme.

(3) These were hitherto under the direct control of the Board of Revenue which has been transferred by the Act to a committee of 3 or more persons to be appointed by the Local Government <sup>(4)</sup> for life <sup>(5)</sup> unless removed for misconduct or unfitness. They must of course belong to the creed of the founder and be selected in accordance with the general wishes of those interested in the endowment. <sup>(6)</sup>

(4) The endowment will be in charge of the trustee, manager, or superintendent acting under the committee. <sup>(7)</sup>

(5) Any person interested in the endowment may, on previously obtaining leave of the court, <sup>(9)</sup> sue the manager or any member of the committee "for any misfeasance, breach of trust or neglect of duty" in respect of the trusts vested in or confided to them respectively <sup>(9)</sup> and the Civil Court may decree specific performance of any act and direct the removal of such manager or member and award damages or costs.

"Any person having a right of attendance or having been in the habit of attending at the performance of the worship or service of any mosque, temple or religious establishment, or of partaking of the benefit of the distribution of any alms, shall be deemed to be a person interested" <sup>(10)</sup> for the purpose of maintaining a suit. The founder's heir has a direct interest and may, of course, institute such suit. <sup>(11)</sup>

2026. Civil Procedure Code.—S. 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure runs as follows :—

2027. In the case of any alleged breach of any express or constructive trust, created for public purposes of a charitable or religious nature or where the direction of the Court is deemed necessary for the administration of any such trust, the Advocate-General, or two or more persons having an interest in the trust and having obtained the consent in writing of the Advocate-General, may institute a suit, whether contentious or not, in the principal Civil Court of original jurisdiction or in any other court empowered in that behalf by the Local Government within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the whole or any part of the subject-matter of the trust is situate to obtain a decree—

- (a) removing any trustee
- (b) appointing a new trustee
- (c) vesting any property in a trustee
- (d) directing account and inquiries
- (e) declaring what proportion of the trust property or of the interest therein shall be allocated to any particular object of the trust
- (f) authorizing the whole or any part of the trust property to be let, sold, mortgaged or exchanged
- (g) settling a scheme or
- (h) granting such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require.

2028. It will be seen that a suit in respect of a religious endowment is possible both under the Religious Endowments Act as under the Code of Civil Procedure as also independently of them. <sup>(1)</sup> As this last has been already considered, the question here to consider is what is the difference between the two suits.

2029. A comparison of the language of the enactments shows that—

(1) Since the Act of 1863 does not apply to charitable endowments, a suit relating to it can only be brought under S. 92 of the Civil Procedure Code.

(2) But since neither statute deals with private religious endowments, no suit in respect thereto can be brought under the authority of either statute. Such a suit when maintainable is independent of any statutory sanction; and is founded on the right of suit of a subject to vindicate his ordinary civil rights.

(3) Since both the Act and the Code deal with public religious endowments, so far as the suits instituted under the Code, its provisions partially cover suits for "any misfeasance, breach of trust, or neglect of duty" committed by the manager <sup>(2)</sup> so far as it is comprised in the clause "directing accounts and enquiries"—otherwise the two Acts deal with suits of a wholly different character as will be seen from the reliefs possible in the two cases.

2030. The only reliefs claimable under the Endowment Act are removal of the manager only for "misfeasance, breach of trust or neglect of duty," whereas under the Code he may be removed on any other ground, such as incompetence or for forsaking the sect of which the idol is the deity, or introducing a new form of ritual or worship.

(4) That is, while the Religious Endowments Act deals with specific suits for a specific remedy, the Code deals with other suits and though on a point or two it covers the same ground as the Religious Endowments Act, the purpose and object of the two suits is different. This is implied in the saving clause in the Civil Procedure Code which saves the procedure prescribed by the Religious Endowments Act for the institution of a suit thereunder. <sup>(3)</sup>

(1) Radhabai v. Chimm ji, 8 B. 27; Chintaman v. Dhondo, 15 B 612 (628); Jan Ali v. Ram Nath, 8 C. 82

(2) Ib. S. 14.

(3) S. 92 (2), Civil Procedure Code.

2031. It is thus clear that suits relating to religious endowments fall into three classes, namely :—

(1) Those supported by common law and independently of any statutory support.

(2) Those maintainable under the Religious Endowments Act.

(3) Those provided by S. 92 of the Civil Procedure Code.

2032. Suits under common law.—The first class of suits, that is to say, suits unsupported by the statute law have been entertained by the courts for a claim to a specific share out of the dedicated property for the benefit of the founder (1) or for recovery of the entire property by him on the ground that the trust has not been acted upon (2) or for recovery of possession of the dedicated property from the manager who was claiming it as his private property without praying for any of the three reliefs contemplated in S. 14 of the Act, i.e., for removal of the manager, specific performance of an act by him, or for damages (3) or a suit by a trustee for recovery of property from an ex-trustee who had been dismissed from his office by a temple committee, (4) or a suit for recovery of property or damages against the heirs of the deceased manager for property lost by his breach of trust or for negligence, (5) or a suit against the alienee for the declaration of the invalidity of an alienation made by the manager of trust property, (6) or a suit to establish a right to share in the management (7) or a suit by the trustee dismissed from office for a declaration that the dismissal is wrongful or for restoration to office, (8) or a suit by a manager for a declaration of his title as the rightful manager and for recovery of possession as such, (9) or for the appointment of himself or some other person as manager. (10)

2033. Such is the right of a worshipper complaining of obstruction in the performance of his devotion to an idol or temple (11) or of the founder to enforce the trusts, (12) or a suit by a trustee, (13) or by a committee appointed under the Act for damages for misappropriation or for an injunction. (14)

Such and similar suits are opposed to no provision of law and being in violation of one's civil rights, are clearly maintainable.

2034. Suits under the Religious Endowment Act.—It has been held in Madras that the Act is not controlled by its preamble and applies equally to all endowments subject only to S. 3 (15) but it has already been stated that the better view is that the Act is only limited to public religious endowments. (16) Now suits under this Act are of a limited character, being limited both as to their nature and to the extent of the relief admissible. Since a suit under the code is equally possible for removal of the trustee or for "accounts and inquiries" and consequential damages, the plaintiff has to that extent the choice of procedure. He may proceed under the Act or under the Code (1) But the Act has clearly no application where the plaintiff sues not only for the removal of the trustee but also the settling of a scheme (2) or the appointment of a new trustee.(3) Again even where the suit is for the relief mentioned in S. 14 sanction is only necessary when the trustee is sued as such. (4)

2035. A sanction granted to two or more persons under the Act cannot be availed of by any one of them, without getting the sanction amended. (5)

A sanction obtained under S. 18 is not revisable by the High Court. (6) It is competent to the court to make independent enquiry into the allegations made before according sanction. (7) One refusal to sanction suit does not bar another application and it is open to the court to entertain it if supported by sufficient grounds. (8)

The petitioner should be awarded his costs out of the trust funds unless his application was frivolous or vexatious. (9)

2036. As regards the nature of the suits contemplated by S. 14 it has been held that that section merely provides for suits of the specific nature mentioned in the section. A suit for recovery of immoveable property on behalf of a muth on the ground of misfeasance by the manager without a prayer for removal of the manager or for damages or for the specific performance of any act by the manager does not fall under S. 14. (10)

2040. The section only applies if there is an express or constructive trust. An express trust is created by contract, a constructive trust arising not by act of the parties but by operation of law. A trustee de son tort may be a constructive trustee and as such subject to the section. (9)

2041. It is not necessary that the plaintiffs should allege any breach of trust or misconduct on the part of the manager. All that is necessary is that the plaintiffs should make out a prima facie case for the direction of the court as necessary for the administration of the trust. Any act or omission which endangers the trust property or shows a want of honesty or want of a proper capacity to execute the duties or want of reasonable facility, is sufficient to justify the intervention of the court. (1) A hereditary trustee may be removed if his continuance is likely to endanger the interests of the institution. (2)

2042. Case for sanction.—As already stated, sanction of the Advocate-General or of his substitute provided in S. 93 is necessary to maintain a suit. It is a condition imposed to prevent frivolous and vexatious suits. (3) The suit under the Code is a representative suit in which the plaintiffs represent the interest of the body of beneficiaries. The fact that the plaintiffs are two out of the five trustees, does not entitle them to sue the remaining three without sanction. (4) Where two persons start a suit with due sanction, the addition of a third person as co-plaintiff does not necessitate fresh sanction. (5) Where two persons obtained sanction and one of them afterwards dies, a fresh sanction is required to institute a suit. When it is once properly instituted by the authorized plaintiffs, the death of one of them does not determine the suit which may be continued by the surviving plaintiff. (6) But where more than two persons have obtained sanction they must all sue. It is not sufficient that two of them sue without the rest. (7)

2043. "Having an interest in the trust."—The fact that two or more persons have obtained sanction of the Advocate-General does not confer upon them an incontestable right to maintain the suit, it being open to the defendant to show that the plaintiffs had in fact no interest in the trust. The interest requisite to sustain the suit must be direct and not distant, substantial and not sentimental. So where two persons sued with sanction for the removal of the trustees at Tellicherry and it appeared that one of them was a pleader resident and practising in Madras, and his sole interest in the temple at Tellicherry lay in the fact that he was the Vice-President of a Religious Protection Society, and had visited the temple only once or twice when on a professional visit to Tellicherry, it was held that he did not possess the "interest" required to maintain a suit under S. 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure which was accordingly dismissed. (8) In this case it was pointed out that the description of interest in S. 15 of the Religious Endowments Act could not be called in aid to construe S. 92 of the Civil Procedure Code.

2044. When no sanction required.—No sanction is required where the suit is instituted by the whole body of persons who are legally authorized to administer the trust to which it relates. As observed in a case: "Persons interested in any trust were, if they could all join, always competent to maintain a suit against any trustee for his removal for breach of trust; but where the joining of all of them was inconvenient or impracticable, it was considered desirable that some of them might sue without joining the others, provided they obtained the consent of the Advocate-General or of the Collector of the District and this condition was imposed to prevent an indefinite number of reckless and harassing suits being brought against trustees by different persons interested in the trust. Where this condition is fulfilled and the risk of harassing suits being brought against trustees is thus guarded against, there is no reason why suits brought under the section should be restricted in any other way." sanction is required to maintain a suit instituted by the whole body of persons who are legally authorized to administer the trust to which it relates. (1)

2045. Necessary parties.—Not only the manager but any person interested in the trust property may be made a party. A person who denies the trust and claims the property as his private property is a necessary party. (2) But the section only contemplates a suit against a trustee and not against a trespasser against whom persons interested have an independent cause of action. (3) No relief can be granted in a suit under the section against alienees of trust property. (4) But a trustee whether de jure or de facto or de son tort may be sued under this section and are necessary parties, when any relief is claimed against them. (5)

2046. Reliefs claimed.—A suit under the section must relate only to the reliefs enumerated in the section, the last clause of which refers to “such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require” and the question has arisen whether it is to be read ejusdem generis with those mentioned in the previous clauses or is intended to enlarge their scope by reducing them to mere illustrations of the more general relief possible under the section. (6) It has been held that the further relief must be ejusdem generis with the preceding clauses. (7)

2047. Removal of any trustee.—This clause was for the first time inserted by the Code of 1908, in accordance with the previously decided cases, (8) overruling however, the two cases of the Madras Court in which the contrary was laid down. (9) The courts, before the present clause, let in the right as a “further relief” which, strictly speaking, his removal could not be when it was the only relief claimed, though where the court was moved to settle a scheme the removal of the trustee might be provided for as a part of the new scheme and it is said that in every such case it is advisable to the court to provide for the removal of the trustee for breach of trust which might then be done in execution instead of a suit of its own (10). The causes which justify the removal of a trustee have already been set out in S. 218. The general principle there enunciated accords with the principle of law enunciated by Story: “But in cases of positive misconduct, courts of equity have no difficulty in interposing to remove trustees who have abused their trust: it is not indeed every mistake or neglect of duty, or inaccuracy of conduct of trustees, which will induce courts of equity to adopt such a course. But the acts or omissions must be such as to endanger the trust property or to shew a want of honesty, or want of proper capacity to execute the duties, or a want of a reasonable fidelity.” (11) Citing this passage with approval, Lord Blackburn said: "It seems to their Lordships that the jurisdiction which a Court of Equity has no difficulty in exercising under the circumstances indicated by Story is merely ancillary to its principal duty, to see that the trusts are properly executed. This duty is constantly being performed by the substitution of new trustees in the place of the original trustees for a variety of reasons in non-contentious cases. And therefore, though it should appear that the charges of misconduct were either not made out, or were greatly exaggerated, so that the trustees were justified in resisting them, and the court might consider that in awarding costs, yet if satisfied that the continuance of the trustee would prevent the trusts being properly executed, the trustee might be removed. It must always be borne in mind that trustees exist for the benefit of those to whom the creator of the trust has given the trust estate." (1)

2048. If the beneficiaries or those who act for them are unable to work in harmony with the trustee, and if there is no reason to the contrary from the intentions of the founder of the trust to give the trustee a benefit or otherwise, the trustee is always advised by his own counsel to resign and he does so. If, without any reasonable ground, he refused to do so the court will remove him. (2) "In exercising so delicate a jurisdiction as that of removing trustees, their Lordships do not venture to lay down a general rule beyond the very broad principle above enunciated and the main guide must be the welfare of the beneficiaries. Probably it is not possible to lay down any more definite rule in a matter so essentially dependent on details, often of great nicety." (3) "It is quite true that friction or hostility between trustees and the immediate possessor of the trust estate is not of itself a reason for the removal of the trustees. But where the hostility is grounded on the mode in which the trust has been administered, where it has been caused wholly or partially by substantial overcharges against the trust estate, it is certainly not to be disregarded." (4)

2051. Vesting in a trustee.—The vesting of any property in a trustee may become necessary by the removal or appointment of a trustee (3) to whom it is competent to the court to deliver possession of the trust property by ejecting the outgoing trustee, or it is said, a stranger, in wrongful possession of the trust property. (4) But it is submitted and has been held, that this section does not empower ejectment of strangers such as trespassers and transferees from the trustee. (5)

2052. Accounts and inquiries.—This clause enables the court to order the manager to render account of the trust property in his charge (6, and to decree any sum which may be found due from him or for which he may be liable. (7) Such sum may include mesne profits. (8)

2053. Settling a scheme.—Clauses (e) to (g) relate to the settling of a scheme of management. In so doing due consideration should be given to the established practice of the institution and to the position of the persons connected with it. (9) Where the founder's intention cannot be ascertained, effect must be given to it cypres. (10) Before a scheme can be settled, an account of the trust property must be taken and until the trust funds are ascertained it is impossible to settle the scheme. (11) A scheme framed by the court is liable to variation on good cause being shown and if found injurious to the institution, may be set aside. (12)

2055. It is competent to the court to declare what proportion of the corpus or of the interest therein shall be allocated to any particular object of the trust. In this matter the court has ample power to give directions towards application of the trust income, even though the trustee may not himself be competent similarly to apply it. (13)

2057. Further relief.—It has already been stated that the further or other relief must be ejusdem generis and subsidiary or ancillary to those possible under the preceding clauses. (1)

2058. Charitable endowments.—By the common law the Supreme Courts of Judicature were entitled to control public charities. S. 41 of the East India Company Act 1813<sup>(2)</sup> conferred powers on the Advocate-General similar to those of the Attorney-General in England. Similarly, Ss. 8-11 of the Official Trustees Act <sup>(3)</sup> enables any person to appoint the official trustee with his consent to be the trustee of any property for a charitable purpose or otherwise, whereupon the property so granted shall vest in him. The official trustee may be paid such remuneration as he shall by the deed of settlement be declared to be entitled to receive. <sup>(4)</sup> The official trustee may be appointed in place of the other trustees refusing to act as provided in S. 10 in which case he is entitled to receive the remuneration as fixed by S. 11. The jurisdiction of the Official Trustees is limited to the three Presidencies. While these two Acts made some provision for the administration of charities within the jurisdiction of the High Courts, similar charities in the Mofussil remained unprovided for. These are now dealt with by the Charitable Endowments Act, 1890 <sup>(5)</sup> which enables the author of the trust, or the trustees, if already appointed, <sup>(6)</sup> to apply to the Local Government which may settle a scheme for the administration of any property <sup>(7)</sup> and vest the property in a trustee called the Treasurer of Charitable Endowments <sup>(8)</sup> on such terms as to the application of the property or the income thereof, as may be agreed on between the Local Government and the person or persons making the application and the property, shall thereupon so vest accordingly. <sup>(9)</sup> The scheme so settled may in a similar manner be modified or substituted. The Local Government is, in the exercise of its powers under the Act, subject to the control of the Governor-General in Council. <sup>(10)</sup>

CHAPTER XX.

SUCCESSION BY SURVIVORSHIP.

222. (1) When a person dies possessed of co-parcenary property his interest therein passes to the other co-parceners then living by right of survivorship, who take it in their own right and not in trust for the heirs of the deceased.

Provided that where he has left sons or grandsons in the male line his interest survives to them to the exclusion of his other co-parceners.

(3) Where such property passes to the surviving co-parceners, they take per stirpes and not per capita.

(4) Nothing herein applies to members of a Dayabhag family who take by inheritance and not by survivorship.

2059. Analogous Law.—From what has been said before it is clear that co-parcenary property held by the joint family is in the nature of property held by a co-parcener with perpetual existence, the members whereof vary but the death of a member has no greater effect beyond causing a lapse of his share. As the Privy Council said: "According to the principles of Hindu Law, there is co-parcenership between the different members of a united family, and survivorship follows upon it; there is community of interest and unity of possession between all the members of the family and upon the death of any one of them, the others may well take by survivorship that in which they had during the deceased's life-time a common interest and a common possession. But the law of partition shows that as to the separately-acquired property of one member of a united family, the other members of that family have neither community of interest nor unity of possession. The foundation therefore, of a right to take such property fails." (1)

2060. So Sir Barnes Peacock said in another case: "According to the Mitakshara law, if a member of a joint undivided family dies without a son, and leaving a brother, his widow does not take his share by descent. If he leaves a son, the son takes by descent ; but if he leaves only a widow, the survivors take by survivorship and they hold the property, which they take by survivorship legally and equitably for themselves, and not in trust for the heirs of the deceased. The deceased sheirs have no interest either legally or equitably in the share which passes by survivorship to the surviving co-sharers. That the estate survives and does not pass to the widow by inheritance, has been held by the Privy Council to be the law. They held that, in the absence of a son, the share of a deceased member of a joint family, under the Mitakshara law does not go to the widow or to the person who would be next heir of the deceased, if the widow were not in existence" (1) "While the joint property endures, there is strictly speaking no question as to succession to the property. The joint family is a corporation in the sense of having a continuous existence, notwithstanding the death of individual members, and it is now settled that, under the Mitakshara law, no individual member of the family has any specific interest in the property, or the power of creating any for himself independently of the other members: he has only a right to insist upon a partition being effected if at all. But by the nature of the case, the joint family must commence and also must end, when it does end, in an individual who holds the property in a separate condition. This individual dies without becoming the root of a joint family, and the Mitakshara law gives an interim enjoyment of the property to his female representatives, when there are any, and then transfers it to a collateral heir as the origin of a new joint family. Thus the Mitakshara law does nothing to keep property in the condition of being the separate property of an individual throughout a series of takers, and indeed is hostile to such a state of things. If however, in any given case, property is so situated that it does pass from one taker to another taker just in the same condition as if it were the separate or self-acquired property of each of them personally, independently of the family element, then this result, I conceive, can only be brought about, if at all, by the operation of some established custom or authority controlling the general Mitakshara law." (2) This view has been echoed in several cases (3) in which it is now settled that "while the joint family endures, there is, strictly speaking no question as to succession to the property."

Those who are born into the family and those who go out of it do not affect the joint property beyond varying the shares of the rest. Consequently when a co-parcener dies, his interest survives and passes to his other co-parceners who "hold the property, which they take by survivorship legally and equitably for themselves and not in trust for the heirs of the deceased." (4)

2061. Succession by Survivorship.—Succession by survivorship is limited to two descriptions of property, namely: (1) what is taken as unobstructed heritage ( § 1048) and property acquired by means of it and (2) what forms the joint property of re-united co-parceners. (5) There is a radical difference between survivorship and inheritance since, survivorship is an incident of co-parcenary right and arises on birth while a right of inheritance is only acquired on death. (6) One is the incident of a vested right,

(1) Sadabart v. Foolbush, 14 W. R. 340 F. B.

(2) Ram Narain v. Pertum Singh, 20 W. R. 189.

(5) Jesoda v. Sheo Pershad, 17 C. 38

(6) Ghosal v. Ghosal, 31 B. 25.

the other is a mere contingency. A right by survivorship must necessarily vary with the number of co-parceners at any time and with every increase by birth or adoption the quantum of undivided interest of each of the co-parceners is correspondingly reduced. If on the other hand, any of them dies his share passes to the rest whose interest is correspondingly increased. As explained before, co-parcenership is a joint right which the co-parcener cannot devise or alien except in the limited circumstances permitted by law.

The right of survivorship has, therefore, nothing in common with the law of inheritance. As however it is a right affected by death, all it needs is a passing reference to its leading principles by way of comparison with the doctrine of inheritance.

2063. As co-parcenership is only possible within the circle of one's family, the question of co-parcenership is one of family law. A person cannot create co-parcenary rights by contract (§ 1106). It must arise by law. Women cannot be co-parceners. <sup>(2)</sup> Hence on the death of the owner his co-parcenary rights may pass to one set of persons and his separate property to another. Where for instance, the owner has left a brother and wife, his co-parcenary interest will survive to his brother, while his separate property will devolve on his wife. <sup>(3)</sup>

Again if the property be impartible, it devolves not on the co-parcener nearest in blood but on the nearest co-parcener in the senior line. <sup>(4)</sup> The succession to an impartible estate follows the rule of survivorship according to the personal law of the owners. <sup>(5)</sup> This has already been explained.

CL. (2). 2064. This is the general rule but it is subject to one exception stated in clause (2) and supported by the following text:—

Mitakshara:—Although grandsons have by birth a right in the grandfather's estate, equally with sons, still the distribution of the grandfather's property must be adjusted through their father, and not with reference to themselves. The meaning here expressed is this: if undivided brothers die leaving male issue, and the number of sons be unequal, one having two sons, another three, and a third four, the two receive a single share in right of their father, the other three take one share appertaining to their father, and the remaining four similarly obtain one share due to their father. So if some of the sons be living, and some have died leaving male issue, the same method should be observed, the surviving sons take their own allotments, and the sons of their deceased brothers receive the shares of their own father's respectively. Such is the adjustment prescribed by the text. (1)

This is the right of representation of a person by his sons and grandsons or as it is explained, the father together with his son and grandson forms a single individual and on the death of the former the latter take his share to the exclusion of his undivided brothers. The rule then that the interest of a co-parcener on his death passes to the other co-parceners is subject to the exception that where he has left male issue it passes to them and not to the general body of survivors.

(2) The case is the same where the widow of a deceased co-parcener takes a son in adoption.

2065. Acquisition per stirpes.—For the same reason the rights of other co-parceners are enlarged per stirpes and not per capita;

CL. (3) since the rule of representation is equally applicable to all co-parceners. As observed by the Full Bench, "The consequence of the doctrine that a right in the paternal ancestral estate is acquired by birth is that there is in fact no devolution of the property from one owner to another, but that as each son comes into being he forthwith acquires a right which would, on partition, reduce the shares of the other sons, and which should he not survive partition and have issue, his son or grandson would take by substitution and which, if he dies issueless before that period, will simply lapse. There being no devolution of the property, the laws of descent are inapplicable. An ascertainment of the rights or the several members of the family is effected by partition and consequently the rules regulating partition in every Hindu work on inheritance take the place regulating the descent of property from an owner leaving issue. Unless there is a plain direction to the contrary, rules of partition from their very nature operate at the time when the partition is made. Seeing that a son in the undivided family is a co-owner, having acquired his right by birth, there is no more reason for fixing the date of the death of the father as the period at which shares should be ascertained than in fixing the date of a son's death as that period; and if shares are not ascertained until the period of distribution, if until the time no one can declare he has any share in the common property, it accounts for the circumstance that in none of the treatises on Hindu Law which have been brought to our notice is there any rule as what is to be done with the interest (it can hardly be called a share) in the common property which has been acquired by a member of the family who has not survived the period of distribution. On the other hand, there are express rules declaring that the partition is to be an equal partition subject to the qualification that those who take by representation take only the share which he whom they represent would have taken, had he survived partition. 2066. Dayabhag family different.—This is, however, the view of the orthodox school, the survival of an ancient institution in which individual, as distinguished from the corporate rights are totally ignored. The Dayabhag admits the right of widows and the daughter, the mother and the paternal grandmother "under express texts."<sup>(1)</sup> And as will be seen in the sequel, although the Dayabhag places in the forefront the doctrine of spiritual efficacy, it does not subscribe to the orthodox rules of survivorship but rather treats the co-parcener in a joint family as holding his interest in quasi severalty which on his death passes to his heirs by descent and not by survivorship. "In most cases propinquity, spiritual efficacy and natural love and affection run in the same lines and no difficulty arises, but whenever they run in different lines Jimut Vahan was compelled to ignore spiritual efficacy and had recourse to other principles or express texts."<sup>(2)</sup> This is a subject for examination under another head.<sup>(3)</sup> For the present all that need be stated is that the Dayabhag does not recognize succession by survivorship which is a doctrine peculiar to the Mitakshara

223. Where the deceased was at his death the sole co-parcener, his estate devolves upon his heirs in the same manner as if it were his separate property.

When co-parcenary property devolves on heirs.

2067 Analogous Law.—The right of survivorship postulates the existence of co-parceners. If therefore, the deceased was the sole surviving co-parcener, the co-parcenary ceases with his death and the persons who take his estate are his natural heirs. "By the nature of the case the joint family must commence and also must end, when it does end, in an individual who holds the property in a separate condition. If this individual dies without becoming the root of a joint family, the Mitakshara law gives an interim enjoyment of the property to his female representatives, when there are any, and then transfers it to a collateral heir as the origin of a new joint family."<sup>(4)</sup>

CHAPTER XXI.

MITAKSHARA INHERITANCE.

2068. Topical Introduction.—The devolution of property of a Hindu dying intestate may be by inheritance, succession, or survivorship, according to the nature of his property. If the property was his separate or self-acquired property then it passes to his heirs by inheritance—a term derived from the Roman heres. The distinction between inheritance and co-parcenership is that in the case of inheritance property devolves on death, while it survives in the case of co-parcenership; on inheritance, new rights are acquired, on survivorship the enjoyment of existing rights is increased by the removal of one from the body of co-sharers. (1) As Vignyaneshwar says, “The term ‘heritage’ signifies that wealth which becomes the property of another solely by relation to the owner. The wealth of the father or of the paternal grandfather becomes the property of his sons or grandsons, by the right of their being sons or grandsons. The property devolves on parents (or uncles), brothers, and the rest, upon the demise of the owner, if there be no male issue in the right of their being his uncles or brothers. The same holds good in respect of their sons or other (descendants).” (2)

“Therefore it is a settled point that property in the paternal or ancestral estate is by birth and not by demise of the last owner” (3) But under the Dayabhag family with the father as the head, the other co-parceners have no vested rights. Their rights do indeed arise on birth, and they are alienable and devisable but they lack the cardinal incident of forcing a partition. While then under the Mitakshara system the rights of all co-parceners are co-ordinate, those of the members under the Dayabhag are contingent and in the nature of spes successionis though they are alienable.

2069. The two systems differ radically on the subject of inheritance though the difference here lies in the process of reasoning rather than in the result. The Mitakshara selects the heirs upon the rational basis of propinquity, but the Dayabhag selects them not so much upon their propinquity as upon the efficacy of their obsequial offerings to the manes of the deceased. But when the Mitakshara professes to consult propinquity it dissembles, since its conception of heirship is equally tinged with an under-current of religious thought; and while the Dayabhag places it in the forefront, it equally dissembles for its idea of heirship is equally tinged with the under-current of affinity and its consequent natural affection. In both systems women enter with apologies. But their number and rights are limited, though curiously the Dayabhag with the more conservative ideal of spiritual benefit admits the nearest females which the Mitakshara excludes. But both systems are equally defective and the courts had to struggle for a more rational construction in order to rectify their glaring defects. Take for instance the case of the daughter and the sister. The former is directly admitted by the Dayabhag in the list of heirs but the latter has no place in the system. In Bombay the court had however to assign her a place in response to insistent usage. But usage is naturally of slow growth and it still keeps out the sister outside the Mayukh law. There are other inequalities and differences far too numerous to be noticed here. They will be found set out in the sequel.

2070. Both the Mitakshara and the Dayabhag start with designating certain nearest relations as heirs of the deceased. They constitute what the Mitakshara calls the compact series of heirs and are given below.

Mitakshara.

Dayabhag.

| (1) Son.            | (1) — (6) As in the Mitakshara. |
| (2) Grandson.       |                                 |
| (3) Great-grandson. |                                 |
| (4) Widow.          |                                 |
| (5) Daughter.       |                                 |

| (8) The mother.     | (8) The father.                 |

2071. After these heirs both systems generally declare that the inheritance shall fall on the nearest Sapinda. The whole Hindu Law of inheritance may be said to be centred in this single word. What is then a Sapinda? Unfortunately it is the one word upon the import of which the two systems differ. The word sapinda comes from two Sanskrit words, Sah meaning 'with', and Pinda, 'a ball or body.'

2072. The Dayabhag accepts the first and the Mitakshara, the second as the real meaning. According to the latter a Sapinda is a relation who is of the same body or between whom and the deceased there are the largest number of common particles of the same body. As such the son, possessing as he does the largest number of particles of his father's body, is therefore his next heir. But the Dayabhag admits the conclusion, though not the reason. According to it, the son is such an heir because he and his father are allied by the funeral ceremony of "Pindu Kram." This is not clear to the unsophisticated student of law unversed in the religious law of the Hindus.

2073. As has been pointed out in the General Introduction (§ 5) the Hindu law of inheritance is an offshoot of those mysterious religious rites and dogmas with which the ancient scripture of all patriarchal people teem. They begin with an assumption that life is permanent and outlives the body after decay and as life requires for its sustenance material pabulum, its continuance must depend upon its constant supply even after life to all appearances has vanished. In other words when a man dies his body decays but his spirit survives the body with all its earthly longings and cravings. After death the spirit yearns for the food and drink to which it had become accustomed in its earthly sojourn. Some provision had to be made for its nutrition after death. What is more natural than that he who inherits worldly wealth must also provide for the nutrition of the departed soul. The priests who are the vice-regents of god know what it wants. What more natural than that the rice and roots upon which the man lived while in life should be dedicated to his soul after his death. He who provides them to the vanished soul must take his heritage. And as the son is tied to him by the bond of affection, he is most likely continue to perform these post obit offices to prevent the departed soul wandering about in the vacant void restless from hunger. As fire is the mouth of the gods these ethereal bodies require their food to be conveyed through that channel. It is the genesis of sacrifice.

2074. The sacrifice ordained for the dead was called a Shradh. It was to be performed in the dark half of every lunar month. The heir must roll boiled rice with butter and consign them to the fire in the name of the person whom he desires it to reach. It will go to him. This rolled rice of the size of a billiard ball—miscalled a cake, is the offering of the living to the dead. If the son is alive he must offer it. If he is dead some other relation, must perform that pious office. In the remote patriarchal age its order became soon settled. It is needless to add that all agreed who were the nearest heirs. Hence so far the two systems agree. But as the line of heirs became in time enlarged, other rules had to be invented to regulate succession. The one kept up the fiction of the spiritual repast, the other boldly addressed itself to the natural law of affinity. But as stated before neither affinity nor the religious thought was wholly eliminated from the two systems. They acted and re-acted upon each other till they became crystallized by a declaration of the Mahomedan conquerors and afterwards by the British that the personal law of the Hindu shall regulate their succession. At the time neither system had been fully developed. New ideas were creeping in and leavening the inert mass of Shastric ritual. But the decadence of religion brought about by the levelling influence of the western culture left the religion in a state of neglect while the law which was dependent upon it had to be developed and adopted to the rapidly changing social environment. The very unsatisfactory system of having to find the new law in the old age is responsible for the conflicting decisions of the Courts on almost every point. What is now required is a secularization of Hindu Law which alone will ensure its development.

2075. As it is, the tests by which the true heir are known are rapidly vanishing from the daily observance of the people. Mr. Sarkar observes that there is scarcely a Hindu nowadays who performs the Parvan Shradh and that "hence the conferring of spiritual benefit on ancestors by presenting pindas to them in the Parvan Shradh is a myth in the majority of instances." (1) And yet this is the raison d'être of inheritance.

(1) Both the systems recognize the claims of the nearest heirs which they designate as entitled to the heritage as such.

(2) In default of these heirs, the order of succession in the two systems differs, though they both quote and profess to follow Manu's aphorism that to the nearest Sapinda the inheritance next belongs. They, however, differ on the meaning of the word Sapinda. The Mitakshara takes it to comprise only agnation up to the sixth degree, while the Dayabhag limits it to relations up to the 3rd degree but includes therein both the agnates and cognates, the result being that cognatic relations whom the Mitakshara relegates after all agnates, take with the sapindas—otherwise the Sakulyas and Samanodaks being agnatic relations from the fourth to the 14th degree exclude the cognates in both systems. After the Samanodaks, the Bandhus of the Mitakshara walk in, but the Dayabhag is silent as to the claims of its cognate sapindas from the fourth to the sixth degree. But it is apprehended that in this respect the Dayabhag being silent, the Mitakshara rule would apply.

2077. The law of inheritance of all nations is intended to ensure passage of the soul of a deceased to those nearest and dearest to him. Both the Christian and the Mahomedan laws of succession recognize the claims of wife and children but the Hindu Law of succession placed the male issue before the wife and as a sharer she has no place except at a partition when she is assigned a share in lieu of her right to maintenance. In the matter of women's rights Bombay stands ahead of Madras and Bengal, while the orthodox schools are very sparing of their claim.

In the ensuing chapters this is made apparent by treating of the succession of joint property in a separate chapter.

2079. The conflicting claims of remote heirs have not been all yet settled by judicial decisions but the leading principles regulating their precedence have become well settled; and the courts recognize the force of stare decisis as essentially applicable to the law of property.

2080. Succession is a generic term and includes devolution of a person's property whether by survivorship, devise or inheritance. Strictly speaking, succession should be confined only to the latter modes of devolution, since the right by survivorship arises on birth and not upon the death of any of the co-parceners. Thus if A, B and C be three co-parceners, they all have a third share in the joint property. If A dies, the interest of B and C is enlarged by reason of their survivorship; but it would not be correct to say that B and C have succeeded to A, though in popular parlance that is how the enlargement of their interest is described. (1)

2081. Inheritance, is however a term of more certain import and is used only to denote devolution of the separate or self-acquired property of one on another as his heir. Such devolution may be by will, or by law. In either case the successor is the heir of the deceased to whom he has succeeded. But if the devise was to a person who was not his legal heir, the devisee is not in strictness even his heir, which term is limited to designate a person who takes by reason of his relationship to the deceased recognized by law.

2083. The subject of co-parcenary rights and their devolution has already been examined in the previous chapter. (2) So is also the subject of wills. (3) This chapter deals only with the devolution of property by inheritance, that is to say the succession to self-acquired or separate property by the direction of law.

(1) Ghosal v. Ghosal, 81 B. 25.

(2) Ch. VIII.

(3) Ch. XIII.

224. (1) "Propositus" means the person from whom a descent is traced.

(2) "Last full owner" means one who held the property absolutely at the time of his death.

2084. Analogous Law.—The last full owner has reference not merely to the nature of the property possessed by a person at the time of his death but also to the rights possessed by him. For instance, the Bengal father possesses absolute powers of disposal over co-parcenary property during his life-time. He is the "last full owner" within the meaning of this clause. But since under the Mitakshara full ownership is only possible in respect of property (i) which is the self-acquisition of a member of a co-parcenary; or (ii) which belonged to the sole surviving co-parcener; or (iii) which was possessed by a separated member of his family, the term must be limited to designate such property.

225. "Sapindas" means blood-relations of the propositus to the seventh degree on the father's side and fifth on the side of the mother reckoned from and inclusive of the deceased. Sapindas may be Gotraj or Bhinna gotras.

2085. Analogous Law.—The following texts bear on the subject of Sapinda relationship:—

Manu:—(After specifying the nearer relations as heirs continues) 7. To the nearest Sapinda the inheritance next belongs <sup>(1)</sup> The relation of the Sapinda ceases with the seventh person. <sup>(2)</sup>

Yajnavalkya.—Let him marry an auspicious woman, one not previously married or deflowered; beautiful; unrelated to him as a Sapinda; . . . and who is beyond the fifth and seventh degree on the mother's side and the father's side respectively. <sup>(3)</sup>

Mitakshara : (commenting on the last) See quotation § 480 ante.

2086. According to the Mitakshara definition, a 'sapinda' means and includes:—

(1) Any descendant within the 7th degree reckoned from and inclusive of himself, that is, any of his first six descendants.

(2) Any ascendant within the 7th degree reckoned from and inclusive of himself in the paternal line, that is, any of his first six ascendants in his paternal line.

(3) Any collateral descendant within the seventh degree reckoned from and inclusive of the six paternal ascendants, that is, any of the first descendants of any of the first six ascendants in the paternal line.

(4) Any ascendant within the fifth degree reckoned from and inclusive of himself in the maternal line, that is, any of the four maternal ancestors, namely the mother, the father, her grandfather and the rest: and

(5) Any collateral descendants within the fifth degree reckoned from and inclusive of any of the three maternal ancestors, beginning with the mother's father that is, any of the first four descendants of any of the three maternal ancestors beginning with the mother's father. (1)

2087. The whole Hindu Law of Inheritance is centred in a single word—Sapindas—who are a man's heirs. That word has varied in meaning as the law of inheritance developed. In the earlier stages of society when religion was all in all, religious efficacy was, it is said, the sole test and preferred to propinquity, only those persons being selected as heirs who were most capable of exercising those religious rites which were considered to be beneficial to the deceased. (2) But though this is how the ancient Hindu scriptures treat the question of heirship, it is probable that propinquity was even then the real test and though religion made the offering of oblations as an antecedent prelude to succession to insure their due performance, the two must have at first merely denoted the sequence, though in time they developed into post hoc ergo propter hoc. The other view that in early times the right of inheritance was dependent on the right to participate in the offerings of funeral oblations (3) must be referred to an intermediate stage when that test did not conflict with propinquity and when an undue emphasis laid on the performance of obsequies, could not divert succession from the nearest natural heirs. And in fact in the case of near succession the right depends upon consanguinity under both the systems. It is only in the case of remoter relations that the Dayabhag falls back on the principle of spiritual benefit (4) while Mitakshara consistently follows throughout the rule of propinquity. (5)

At any rate the question of moment to the practical student of law is not to trace the genesis of the rule through its mazes of conflicting and contradictory texts but to examine its present operation on the law of inheritance.

2088. Sapinda. The word "Sapinda" (6) has already been explained before. (§§ 484—489) It is there pointed out that the word is used in a dual sense as signifying one relationship for marriage and another for the purpose of inheritance. The word denotes consanguinity. The term often occurs both in Apastamb and Gautam. But Jimut Vahan gives it a different turn holding that the term means those relations who are connected by funeral oblations (7) in accordance with the following text of Manu.

Manu:—The divine manes are always pleased with an oblation in empty glades on the banks of rivers and in solitary spots.

Having walked in order from east to south and thrown into the fire all the ingredients of his oblation let the sacrificer sprinkle water on the ground with his right hand. From the remainder of the clarified butter, after having formed three balls of rice, let him offer them with fixed attention in the same manner as the water, his face being turned to the south.

Then having offered these balls after due ceremonies and with an attentive mind (to the manes of his father, his paternal grandfather and great grandfather) let him wipe the same hand with the roots of the kus grass which he had before used, for the sake of his paternal ancestors in the 4th, 5th and 6th degrees, who are the partakers of the rice and clarified butter thus wiped off.

(6) As to its meaning See § 484 ante and Ramachandra v. Vinayak, 42 C. 384 (404) P. C. The word may mean—Sa with, and Pinda 'body' or 'ball' i. e., related to the same body or though the funeral ball.

If his father be alive, let him offer the Shradh to his ancestors in three higher degrees. Should his father be dead, and his grandfather living, let him, in celebrating the name of his father (that is, in performing obsequies to him) celebrate also his paternal great great grandfather.

Before the obsequies to ancestors as far as the 6th degree, they must be performed to a Brahmin recently deceased; but the performer of them must in that case give the shradh without the ceremony to the gods, and offer only one round cake (and these obsequies for a single ancestor should be annually performed on the day of his death).

When afterwards the obsequies to ancestors as far as the 6th degree, including him, are performed according to law, then must the offering of cakes be made by the descendants in the manner before ordained for monthly ceremonies.

2089. It will be thus seen that Manu requires the offering of the funeral oblations by one to his six immediate ancestors in the male line, but he draws a line at the third ancestor. That is to say, while these are entitled to the honour of complete rice balls being offered to them, and their Shradh performed, the next three ascendants, that is the ancestor 4 to 6 degrees remote is only entitled to the offals, that is lep or the leavings collected after service to the first three. These three ancestors are also called the Sakulyas. But it is a distinction which is not kept up in the Mitakshara where the term Sapinda is used to denote both classes. Now since the Hindu rule of counting is to include the propositus it follows that the term Sapinda according to Manu means a male relation related up to the seventh degree. As Manu himself says:

Now the relation of the Sapindas, or men connected by the funeral cake, ceases with the seventh person, or in the sixth degree of ascent or descent, and that of the Samanodakas or those connected by an equal oblation of water, ends only, when their births and family names are no longer known. <sup>(1)</sup>

2091. Now sapindas may be either Gotrajs or Bhinna gotra i. e., those who belong to the same gotra or those whose gotras are different. The first are called Gotraj Sapindas and the latter Bhinna Gotra Sapindas—otherwise called Bandhus. The former are agnatic while the latter cognatic kinsmen. Now since a sapinda beyond the third degree is also called a Sakulya, the various terms are thus related :—

(1) Sapinda.

2095. This raises the question, what is a sapinda. The earliest law giver Manu defines it thus: "Now the relationship of the sapindas ceases with the seventh person." (6) This definition is meagre and does not state whether the seven degrees are to be counted both in the line of ascent or descent and whether it includes also collaterals. Vigyaneshwar's definition is more comprehensive, while its explanation in the Mitakshara lets in the following relations who are all sapindas: Son's son's son, the wife, nephew, and brother's wife. But this is by no means an exhaustive list, since Dharm Sindhu of Kashi-nath, the latest writer of the Benares school, gives the following illustrations:—

(1) Suppose Kanti and Gauri are two daughters of Vishnu. Kanti has a son Sudhi, Gauri has a son Har. Budh, Chartra, Gan, Mrira are the son, grandson, great-grandson, great-great-grandson of Sudhi; and Maitra, Siva, Bhup and Achyut are the son, grandson, great-grandson, and great-great-grandson of Har. Rati is a daughter of Mrira and Kama is a son of Achyut. Both of them are eighth in descent from the common paternal ancestor Vishnu ; Rati, and Kama, therefore, can marry each other.

(3) Lit. Skr. Sah. with and Pinda-body or ball. According to the Dayabhag, Sapinda means persons allied by the funeral-ball, according to the Mitakshara, those possessing particles of the same body: See Lallubhai

(2) Suppose again, Datt, Som and Sudhi are the son, grandson and great-grandson, of a common ancestor Vishnu. Shyama and Rati are the daughters of Sudhi, and Budh respectively. Shiv is Shyama's son and Gauri is the daughter of Rati. Shiv and Gauri being both of them sixth in descent from the common maternal ancestor Vishnu are not within the prohibited degree of marriage, and may therefore, marry each other. In the mother's line, it should be remembered that the Sapinda relationship ceases after the fifth degree.

2096. Taking the Mitakshara view of Sapinda relationship, its limits would include 7 degrees, six in ascent and the same number in descent from the propositus in the male line and four degrees in the female line while as regards collaterals it extends to 6 degrees in descent from

To ascertain the degree of relationship in each case it must be counted downwards from a common ancestor allowing a degree to each person.

Sapinda in the female line being called bandhus, will be set out under that head.

2097. Mode of Computation.—The correct mode of counting degrees is now settled to be from the propositus up to the common ancestor, and then down to the person whose relationship is to be determined (1) and not from the common ancestor from whom the lines separated, though it appears to be the mode of calculation adopted in the Mitakshara. Take for instance the following pedigree: According to the first mode of calculation G being more than five degrees from the common ancestor is not a bandhu of P, whereas if the degrees were counted from the common ancestor A, G being within 7 degrees of A would be his bandhu. Some writers (2) favoured this mode of computation which the Privy Council have now held to be erroneous.

226. "Gotraj Sapindas" are all agnates, that is, persons "Gotraj Sapinda" connected with the propositus by an unbroken line of male descent, up to the sixth degree. They are also called "Saman Gotra Sapindas."

227. (1) “Bhinna Gotra Sapindas” are those related to the propositus through a female. They are also known as bandhus.

Bandhus defined

(2) Bandhus may be

(a) “Atma Bandhus,” that is relations of one’s own.

(b) “Pitri Bandhus” that is, the father’s Bandhu.

(c) “Matri Bandhus” that is the mother’s Bandhu.

2099. Analogous Law.—The following texts bear on the subject of this section.

Mitakshara :—1. On failure of gentiles the cognates are heirs. Cognates are of three kinds: related to the person himself, to his father or to his mother as is declared by the following text: “The sons of his own father’s sister, the sons of his own mother’s sister and the sons of his own maternal uncle must be considered as his own cognate kindred. The sons of his father’s paternal aunt and the sons of his father’s maternal uncle, must be deemed his father’s cognate kindred. The sons of his mother’s paternal aunt and the sons of his mother’s maternal uncle must be reckoned his mother’s cognate kindred.”

2 Here by reason of near affinity, the cognate kindred of the deceased himself are his successors in the first instance. On failure of them, his father’s cognate kindred or if there is none, his mother’s cognate kindred. This must be understood to be the order of succession here intended. (2)

2100. In this translation Colebrooke rendered “Gotraj” into “gentiles” and “Bandhus” into “cognates.” He also paraphrases the three classes under which Vigyaneshwar groups the technical bandhus; viz., the Atma bandhus, the Pitri bandhus and the Matri bandhus as “cognates related to the person himself, to his father, or to his mother.” (3) The Privy Council held that Vijyaneshwar was using the term “Bandhu” in a restricted and technical sense, as implying a relation belonging to a different family but united by the Sapinda relationship. In fact he expressly says so. (4)

This enumeration was held to be exhaustive. (5)

2101. The introduction of Bandhus in the catena of heirs is comparatively modern. Manu does not mention any oblations to the maternal ancestors and does not expressly mention Bandhus among the heirs. Yajnavalkya was the first to introduce Bandhus or distant kinsmen related to the deceased through females as heirs and he was also the first to mention the offering of a cake to maternal ancestors. Consequently it became necessary to allow those who could offer Pinda to inherit and thus let the Bandhus in. The cake offered to maternal ancestors was offered to three ascendants of the mother and no lepa was offered to higher ascendants and no water offerings. The right of inheritance was thus confined to five degrees counting the offerer, which is the limit allowed to persons claiming relationship through the mother. (1)

2102. In the course of time the affinity recognized by virtue of spiritual efficacy gave place to the rule of consanguinity but nevertheless the old theory still lingered and was still used to recognize remote connections.

The tripartite division of Bandhus as given in clause (2) is supported by the authority of Yajnavalkya and cannot be added to or extended. (3)

2104. The term "Bandhu or Bandhava" (4) connotes persons bound together by ties of affection. In the Smritis it is a term of uncertain import being used by Manu (5) Vas'ishth (6) Vishnu (7) and Yajnavalkya to mean agnatic relations. Of these Yajnavalkya uses it in no less than 17 places indiscriminately for relatives in general, for agnates, for cognates, and also as a synonym for friends. (8) He reserved the word "Yoni Sam Bandha" (9) for cognatic kinsmen. The term Bandhu was for the first time used in the Mitakshara to connote only cognate relations inferior both to the agnatic Sapindas and Samanodaks. (10) The term is now so used in legal treatises as meaning a cognate sapinda or a sapinda related through a female. The Mitakshara only mentions nine bandhus as such. Adding to them the daughter's son, as provided by a special text, the number of heritable bandhus according to the Mitakshara did not exceed 10 relations. The sister's son remained outside this list and he asserted his claim which, though at first rejected even by the Privy Council, (11) could not long be ignored.

2105. A new principle of exposition was discovered. It was held that the list of bandhus in the Mitakshara was merely illustrative and not exhaustive (12) and the sister's son found a place as a heritable bandhu. (13) This opened the way to a brother's daughter's son (14) a son of the sister's daughter, (15) a maternal uncle. (16) "The term Bandhu applies not only to the maternal kinsmen mentioned above, but also to those kinsmen who are related through females either of the paternal or the maternal line. The daughter's son, the sister's son, the father's sister's son, the brother's daughter's son, or the uncle's daughter's son, are all Bandhus of the paternal line. So in the maternal line, the mother's sister's son, maternal uncle's daughter's son and maternal grandfather's daughter's son are cognate sapindas of the deceased. All these persons belong to a different Gotra and are related by blood to the deceased. They are therefore his bhinnu Gotra Sapindas, or Sapindas bearing a different family name". (1)

2106. Professor Sarvadhikari deduces the following rules from the texts :—

(1) A Bandhu is a cognate Sapinda within four degrees counting (i) from the deceased himself in ascent or descent ; (ii) from any one of the four immediate ancestors of the deceased.

(2) The right of inheritance accrues to the bandhu if the late owner and the person claiming the heritable right were related as Sapindas to each other, either directly through themselves or through their mothers or fathers. In other words, a heritable bandhu is a cognate Sapinda within four degrees counting from

(1) The deceased in ascent or descent.

(2) Deceased's paternal ancestor within four degrees.

(3) Deceased's maternal ancestor within four degrees.

(4) Deceased's father's maternal ancestors within four degrees.

(5) Deceased's mother's maternal ancestor within four degrees.

Note.—The word "five" is to be substituted for "four" in the case of father's bandhus. If the deceased or his ancestor be related through the father's mother, then five degrees should be counted in both directions. Thus a daughter's daughter's grandson is related to the deceased or his paternal ancestor through the father's mother.

2107. Rule of Exclusion.—(1) The cognate descendant of each of these classes is excluded from inheritance when (i) the deceased, or (ii) the deceased's ancestor does not belong to

(a) His maternal grandfather's line.

(b) His father's line.

(c) His mother's line.

(2) The cognate ascendant of the deceased is excluded from inheritance when he does not belong to.

(a) The deceased's maternal grandfather's line.

(b) The deceased's father's line.

(c) The deceased's mother's line.

2108. But it has been held that these rules of exclusion are not warranted by the text. (2) One test formerly favoured (3) but now definitely abandoned (4) was the application of the doctrine of religious efficacy though some courts still cling to the test as a ground of preference.

2109. Mutual Sapindaship.—It has already been pointed out before, that in order that one person should inherit to another by reason of his Sapinda relationship, it is not only necessary to show that he was the Sapinda of the deceased, but that the deceased was also his Sapinda. In other words, mutual Sapindaship is essential to create a heritable right. The fact that one person is the sapinda of another does not necessarily imply that the two are Sapindas of each other. Take for instance, the following tree. P is the propositus. A is his father; S1, S4, S5 are his male descendants and D a female descendant. Now since the Sapinda relationship reaches to the 6th degree in the father's line and 4th degree in the mother's line it follows that P who is related to S5 through his father A, and being in the 6th degree of A (the common ancestor of both) is the Sapinda of S5. But S5 being related to P through his mother D is not his Sapinda because Sapinda relationship in the maternal line does not extend beyond the 4th degree i.e., S2; and in order to be P's Sapinda S5 should have been within 4 degrees of A the common ancestor of both A and S5.

cl (1)

Sapindas to each other either through themselves or through their mother and father. (1) Take for instance the following table for illustration. P is the propositus, A his father, D the daughter of A, D1 the daughter of D whose son is S1 whose son is S2. Now P and S1 are Sapindas to each other, but not P and S2 although S2 is within six degrees from the common ancestor, yet S2 not being the descendant of the line of maternal grandfather, either of S2 or of his father S1 or his mother, they are not Sapindas to each other; but P being a Sapinda of S1, through his mother, they are Sapindas of each other.

Now take another table. Here A, B, & C, are the paternal ancestors of the deceased S1 and S2 are the male descendants of A, B, and C. D represents the female descendants. S4 & S5 are Sapindas of P being both within 6 degrees of A the paternal ancestor of P. But P and S4 are not Sapindas of each other because A a maternal ancestor of S4 is not within 4 degrees from him. Similarly P and S5 are not heritable Sapindas of each other, though P is said to be a Sapinda of S5 "by frog's leap." This theory of the frog's leap is thus explained. P and S4 of the third agnate descendant who is related through the mother

(1) Umaid Bahadur v. Udichand, 6 C. Ramchandra v. Vinayek, 42 C. 384 (120) P.C. 119 (128) F. B.; Babulal v. Nanuk, 22 C. 339.

D are not Sapindas, since the former is beyond the 5th degree. But P and S5 are Sapindas of each other because P is within 6 degrees. Thus of two kinsmen who are descended in two different lines from the same ancestor, the fathers are not Sapindas of each other, while their sons are Sapindas of each other (1).

2111 What is a Bandhu.—A Bandhu has been elsewhere defined as a Bhinna Gotra Sapinda. It has already been seen what is connoted by the term "Sapinda" (§223) and Gotraj (§225). Those who are not Gotraj Sapindas are Bhinna Gotraj Sapindas or Bandhus. The question is who they are. It has been seen that the key word to all these relations is Sapinda and it is now settled to mean both for the purpose of marriage as for inheritance, all kinsmen related to a person up to the seventh degree in the father's side and the fifth degree in the mother's line. (2) As the latter must be necessarily Bandhus it follows that a Bandhu is a cognate relation of a person not more than five degrees remote. But this defines only the genus bandhu and not a heritable Bandhu who must be the nearest Sapinda, the nearness being established by connection by particles of one body (3) which implies mutuality in the Sapinda relationship or to put differently, since the property of a near Sapinda shall be that of a near Sapinda it is clear in order to be a heritable Bandhu of the propositus, a man must be so related to him that they are both Sapindas of each other. (4) This is the test of a heritable Bandhu. As the Privy Council observed. "The general conclusion to which a close examination of the authorities leads their lordships may be briefly stated as follows:—(a) that the sapinda relationship, on which the heritable right of collaterals is founded ceases in the case of the Bhinna Gotra Sapindas with the fifth degree from the common ancestor; (b) that in order to entitle a man to succeed to the inheritance of another, he must be so related to the latter that they are Sapindas of each other. (5)

Taking only the descendants it will be seen that there are 123 such relations as shown in the chart.

Similarly, there are 64 bandhus ex parte paterna; 51 bandhus ex parte materna in addition to which there are 36 father's bandhus and 17 mother's bandhus or altogether 168 bandhus. Taking the two together there are no less than 391 such cognate relations conforming to the first rule; but a great many of them are ineligible by virtue of the second rule as to mutuality already explained. (§§2103-2103).

Those that remain are heritable bandhus who are eligible as heirs but to whom the nearest bandhu will succeed. This is the subject of another rule.

228. "Samanodaks" are relations from the seventh degree to the fourteenth degree and even beyond, if agnatic relationship be clearly established.

Synopsis.

(1) Texts on Samanodaka relationship (2113).(2) Bombay view (2113).

2113. Analogous Law.—The following texts define the Samanodak (1) relationship :

Manu :—(The relation of) Samanodak or those connected by an equal libation of water ends only when their births and family names are no longer known. (2)

Mitakshara :—If there be none such i. e. (Sapindas) the succession devolves on kindred connected by libations of water ; and they must be understood to reach to the seventh degree beyond the kindred connected by funeral oblations of food, or as far as the limits of knowledge as to birth and name extend. Accordingly Vrihat Manu says “ The relation of the Sapindas, or kindred connected by the funeral oblation ceases with the seventh person (3) and that of Samanodaks or those connected by a common libation of water extends to the fourteenth degree : or as some affirm, it reaches, as far as the memory of birth and name extends. This is signified by Gotra or the relation of family name (4)

Following these texts, the Bombay High Court held the Samanodak relationship to extend even beyond the 14th degree if it can be clearly established. (5) It will be seen in the sequel that Samanodak take their place in the line of heirs though their place is perhaps uncertain.

229. (1) “Stridhan”, unless otherwise stated, means the woman’s property acquired by her otherwise than by inheritance or partition over which she possesses full power of disposal.

(2) But in Bombay property inherited by a woman otherwise than from her husband becomes her stridhan.

(3) For the purpose of succession, the Mayukh sub-divides stridhan into (a) technical or proper and (b) non-technical or improper.

(4) Technical or proper stridhan, means and includes (a) a woman’s marriage presents and (b) gifts and bequests made to her by the blood relations.

(5) Non-technical or improper stridhan means and includes (a) properties inherited by her from a male, (b) or received from a stranger, (c) her own earnings and (d) her maintenance grant.

The Mayukh lays down special rules of succession to stridhan technical and non-technical.

2114. Analogous Law.—The following texts support the rules stated in the Section.

Manu :—What was given before the nuptial fire, what was given on the bridal procession, what was given in token of love, and what was received from a brother, a mother, or a father, are considered as the six-fold separate property of a married woman. (1)

Katyayan :—What is given to a woman at the time of her marriage, near the nuptial fire, is celebrated by the wise as woman's property bestowed before the nuptial fire. That again which a woman receives while she is conducted from her father's house (to her husband's dwelling) is instanced as the property of a woman, under the name of gift presented in the bridal procession. Whatever has been given to her through affection by her mother-in-law or by her father-in-law or has been offered to her as a token of respect is denominated an affectionate present. That which is received by a married woman or by a maiden, in the house of her husband or of her father from her brother or from her parents is termed a kind gift. (2)

Yajnavalkya :—What was given to a woman by the father, the mother, the husband or a brother, or received by her at the nuptial fire, or presented to her on her husband's marriage to another wife, as also any other separate acquisition is denominated a woman's property. (3)

Mitakshara :—(citing Manu) The enumeration of six sorts of woman's property by Manu is intended not as a restriction of a greater number, but as a denial of a less.

Ib—That which was given by the father, by the mother, by the husband, or by a brother; and that which was presented (to the bride) by the maternal uncles and the rest (as paternal uncles, maternal uncles etc.), at the time of the wedding before the nuptial fire, and a gift on a second marriage, or gratuity on account of supersession as will be subsequently explained ("To a woman whose husband married a second wife, let him give an equal sum as a compensation for the supersession. s. 84) and also property which she may have acquired by inheritance, purchase, partition, seizure or finding are denominated by Manu and the rest "woman's property" (4)

Dayabhaga :—Over that which has been received by her from any other "but the family of her father, mother or husband or has been earned by her in the practice of a mechanical art (as spinning or weaving) her husband has dominion and full control. He has a right to take it, even though no distress exists. Hence though the goods be hers, they do not constitute woman's property; because she has not independent power over them. But in other descriptions of property excepting these two, the woman has the sole power of gift, sale or other alienation. (5).

Mayukh :—(6) (abstracted) Stridhan is of two kinds (i) technical and (ii) non-technical. Technical stridhan is the property expressly recognized as stridhan by the older sages, such as Katyayan, Manu and Yajnavalkya, that is (a) gifts from strangers at marriage called Yautak (7) and (b) gifts from relations made at any time called Ayautak. (8).

Non-technical stridhan comprises every other kind of property belonging to a woman and more particularly that mentioned in clause 4.

2115. Property given to a woman.—Strictly speaking stridhan is that property of the woman over which she possesses absolute power of disposal. (1) As is stated in the Dayabhag "That alone is the stridhan, which she has power to give, sell or use independently of her husband's control." (2) The term was used in this sense by the Privy Council (3) who said: "There can be no distinction between different portions of a woman's stridhan or separate property. If she can dispose of part of it, she may dispose of the whole." (4) They then cited the following passage from Sir William Macnaghten's Hindu Law with evident approval: "In the Mitakshara whatever a woman may have acquired, whether by inheritance, purchase, partition, seizure or finding, is denominated woman's property, but it does not constitute her peculium," (5) which alone, their Lordships held to deserve the name of stridhan. (6) But they recognize the distinction between stridhan in its wider sense as described in the texts and stridhan "in the narrow sense of that word indicating her separate property or peculium which passes on her death to her own heirs" as distinguished from "Stridhan" in the wider sense in which the word is sometimes used as indicating any property in which she may have some right of proprietorship." (7) "The six-fold enumeration of the sources of a woman's property as given by Yajnavalkya and Manu, corresponds with the technical or narrow signification of stridhan indicating property which is under her absolute control during life and on her death is descendible to her heirs. Do the same characteristics attach to a woman's property derived from the additional sources specified by Vijñaneshwar, viz., inheritance, partition, etc.? The words 'any other' with which Yajnavalkya concluded his enumeration are a translation of the word 'adi' or 'adya' which according to Mr. Mayne (Hindu Law, 7th Ed. p. 823) means 'and the like.' In that view, Yajnavalkya meant to limit his description of 'woman's property' or 'Stridhan' to property acquired in any of the six modes he had just specified or in any other manner eiusdem generis with those modes. Vijñaneshwar's additional enumeration goes beyond that. When read with Yajnavalkya's description, it constitutes a practically complete statement of the means by which a woman can acquire proprietary rights. Dealing with this extended signification of the term "women's property" Vijñaneshwar says in paragraph 3 of the same section that it "conforms in its import with its etymology and is not technical." In paragraphs 2, 3 and 4, therefore, he is speaking of stridhan in its wider sense. The paragraphs 5, 6 and 7 Vijñaneshwar cites the description of 'woman's property' given by Katyayan, which does not expressly profess to be exhaustive, but which closely approximates in character to that given by Yajnavalkya and Manu, and does not include any of the heads (inheritance, partition etc.) added to the list by Vijñaneshwar in paragraph 2. Then comes paragraph 8 which gives rise to the difficulty. It runs thus:

"A woman's property has been described. The author next propounds the distribution of it. 'Her kinsmen take it if she die without issue'."

When Vijñaneshwar says "a woman's property has been thus described" he may have been referring to the description given by his author and by Katyayan and have intended to confine Yajnavalkya's rule of devolution to Yajnavalkya's classification. His language, however, in paragraph 8 when read with what he says in paragraphs, 2, 3 and 4 is open to the meaning that a woman's property of whatsoever kind, descends always to her own heirs. It is difficult to adopt the latter construction in view of the undoubted fact that as Sir Arthur Wilson said in delivering the judgment of their Lordships' Board in Shoo Shankar Lal v. Debi Sahai <sup>(1)</sup> "most of the old commentators recognize with regard to the property of a woman, whether called Stridhan or by any other name, that there may be room for difference in its line of descent according to the mode of its acquisition." <sup>(2)</sup> This case then settles the following points: (i) that the term stridhan has a dual meaning (ii) as meaning a woman's property generally and (iii) as limited only to such property over which she possesses by law an unfettered power of disposal and (iv) that the Mitakshara deals under the head "Woman's property" with both these classes of stridhan; but (v) their mode of devolution must be determined not by what they are called but by how they were acquired; (vi) Stridhan property must comprise only that property classified as such by Manu and Katyayan. All other property possessed by a woman is not her stridhan or peculium properly so called.

2116. What is stridhan.—This being then the test, in order to determine whether any property is a woman's stridhan or peculium, the question to inquire is not so much how it was acquired as what power of disposal she possesses over it. It is conceded that the following six kinds of property are undoubtedly her stridhan:

(1) Nuptial gifts (Katyayan 1-2).

(2) Gifts through affection made by the father-in-law, the mother-in-law and by the elders (Katyayan 3).

(3) Gifts by the father, <sup>(3)</sup> mother, brother <sup>(4)</sup> (Katyayan 3-6) the husband <sup>(5)</sup> or his relations. <sup>(6)</sup> It is equally conceded that this list is not exhaustive. Consequently it has been held that whatever a woman acquires by her own exertion <sup>(7)</sup> or by adverse possession <sup>(8)</sup> becomes her stridhan. Property absolutely gifted or devised to the wife becomes her stridhan if it was so intended. <sup>(9)</sup> So are the arrears of maintenance due to her. <sup>(10)</sup> husband or any other relations <sup>(1)</sup> or whether the property is moveable <sup>(2)</sup> or immoveable. A maiden daughter inheriting the stridhan of her mother does not acquire it as her own stridhan. <sup>(3)</sup>

other heirs and without any of the persons so taking having the power to dispose of the estate during his life-time ; here, inasmuch as an inheritance so described is not legal, such a gift cannot take effect, except in favour of such persons as could take under a gift to the extent to which the gift is consistent with the law. The first taker would, in this case, take for his life-time, because the giver had at least that intention. He could not take more because the language is inconsistent with his having any different inheritance from which that the gift attempts to confer and that estate of inheritance which it confers is void." (1)

2121. It is thus clear that a person cannot direct that his property shall follow a certain course of devolution at variance with his personal law. If he is dissatisfied with that law the only course open to him is to devise his estate or to abandon the law by becoming converted to another faith. So where two brothers entered into an agreement that their estate should only descend in the line of the brother having auras issue and should not be alienated from the line by the latter by adoption, the Privy Council held the agreement void as "entirely altering the law of descent." (2) So where the adopted son relinquished his share in his adopted father's estate in consideration of a sum of money his relinquishment was held to make him a separated son but had not the effect of distinguishing him so that when he father died he was entitled to recover the estate from his adoptive mother. As West, J., put it, "The heirship was a legal consequence of Trimbak's status with regard to Gobind casting on him on Gobind's death, the right correlative to his own obligation under the Varakat and which could not be got rid of by agreement." (3) The course of devolution prescribed by law cannot be altered by private agreement though no doubt Trimbak like a son by birth, could for adequate reasons have been disinherited. (4)

2122. Limits of departure.—But law only determines the heir. It cannot compel the heir to take what he refuses. He may for instance waive his right of succession in favour of another (5) or agree to take a different share to what he was legally entitled or relinquish it altogether. (6)

231. The heir succeeds in his own right and not in a right derived from another.

(2) On a property descending to a male heir, he becomes a fresh stock of descent and the property passes to his own heir, and not to the heir of any previous owner.

(3) But where property descends to a female heir, her heirs are those of the full owner except in Bombay where the female heir becomes a fresh stock of descent.

2124. A person is not disqualified because the person through whom he is related was either disqualified or ineligible. So while a person may be himself disqualified by personal defect, such as congenital blindness, impotency and the like, to inherit still his son would not be disqualified to inherit by reason of the disqualification of his father. <sup>(5)</sup> But in that case the son would not inherit as the son of his father but by reason of his own relationship to the deceased. So the widow of the son <sup>(6)</sup> son's son <sup>(7)</sup> daughter's son <sup>(8)</sup> father <sup>(9)</sup> brother <sup>(10)</sup> cousin <sup>(11)</sup> an uncle <sup>(12)</sup> have no right of inheritance though their husbands were in the line of heirs.

2125. From the fact that an heir must succeed in his own right it follows that the same rule must equally apply to his own heir. Cl. (2). He will succeed to the last owner and not to any previous owner; or to put it differently, the heir being the sole owner of the estate by virtue of inheritance his successor must be his own heir and not the heir of any one else.

2126. The only exception to this rule is the case of a female heir, upon whose death succession devolves not upon her own heirs but upon the heir of the last full owner as if he had died simultaneously with her. Until her death it is impossible to say who are the persons who might be entitled to succeed as heirs to her husband. "The succession does not open to the heirs of the husband until the termination of the widow's estate. Upon the termination of that estate the property descends to those who would have been the heirs of the husband if he had lived up to and died at the moment of her death." (1)

But even this rule is subject to an exception in favour of female heirs other than the widow, the mother and the daughter-in-law or widow of a Gotraj Sapinda in the Bombay Presidency who take by inheritance the same absolute estate as a male which on their death is descendible to the heirs of their Stridhan. But the case of women generally is regarded as exceptional.

Time of vesting

232. (1) On the death of the owner the estate vests immediately in the heir then living.

(2) The inheritance cannot be held in abeyance except when the heir is in the womb.

233. On the vesting of the inheritance the heir becomes entitled to all property which was vested in the deceased in title or in possession, though its enjoyment by the deceased may have been postponed.

2128. Analogous Law.—For the purpose of inheritance and representation the heir is the alter ego of the deceased being in law the continuation of his personality. All rights of the owner vest in him, as he becomes subject to all his liabilities other than those of a purely personal character which do not survive his death. In an old case a contention was raised that under the Hindu Law a widow could only take such property as had been reduced into possession during her husband's life-time. (4) But this contention was overruled by the Privy Council who said, "We do not think that there is anything in the nature of the disputed property which should except it from a general division." (5) In another case the same contention was dismissed with the following remarks "The Judge cites authorities to show that a widow does not represent her husband in respect of succession to an estate which would have devolved upon her husband, had he outlived its owner, but can only take as her husband's heir, such property as he possessed, or was entitled to when he died. The rule as stated cannot affect the present case, in which the interest of the adopted son at the time of his death was not merely the expectant interest of an heir, nor an interest contingent on his outliving the mother (as the Judge supposes) but a vested and absolute interest in the property postponed in enjoyment during the life-time of Wooma Dabea. Whatever may be the precise extent and meaning of the doctrine of the Hindu Law, that a widow succeeding as heir to her husband cannot recover property of which he was not possessed it is inapplicable when the interest is a vested interest under a will or deed, the actual enjoyment being postponed." (1) The question in such cases is not whether the deceased owner died possessed of any property, but rather whether the interest claimed was his "property" within the meaning of law. A mere contingency is not such property. On the other hand a vested interest though not reduced to possession is property and would pass to the heir. (2)

Divesting of Inheritance.

234. An estate once vested cannot be divested except in the following cases.

(a) where the estate has vested in the widow, upon whose adoption of a son her own estate is divested.

(b) by the posthumous son of a father who, if born when the inheritance opened, would have had a preferential claim to the estate.

Synopsis.

2129. Analogous Law.—It is a principle of Hindu Law that an estate once vested cannot be divested by any subsequent event, such as the birth of a preferential heir or co-heir (3). The rule is a natural corollary of that stated in S. viz., that an inheritance can never be in abeyance. So where the rightful heir was excluded from succession by reason of his insanity his subsequent recovery did not entitle him to resume property from an heir who had succeeded to it in consequence of his disqualification when the succession opened. (4) So while unchastity of the wife is a disqualification for inheritance a widow in whom the estate has once vested on the death of her husband cannot be divested by reason of her subsequent unchastity. (5) On the same ground the subsequent conversion of the heir will not divest his estate even though it might be an effective impediment in the way of his taking it. (6) So where the heir became a bairagi it was held that it did not divest him of his inheritance. If he choose to retain his estate however morally wrong it might be, it created no legal disability which the courts could enforce (1).

2130. Exceptions.—The first exception has already been considered (S. 34), it being pointed out that by the adoption the

Exc. (1). widow does not divest any one's estate but her own which she is fully entitled to. But she cannot divest the interest of another if the inheritance has vested in him before her adoption. (§§ 662-671).

2131. The second exception is scarcely an exception at all, if regard is

Exc. (2) had to the view of law that birth relates back to the moment of conception. (2) (See S. 149).

235. The right of a person to succeed

to another is a mere contingency which cannot be transferred or devised or be the subject of a valid contract.

2132. Analogous Law.—The right of a person to succeed to another as his heir is unlike a co-parcenary right (3) a mere spes successionis wholly beyond his control, since it might be defeated any moment by a testamentary disposition by the owner (4).

2133. It is a mere chance which is not transferable(5) or devisable or capable of being even the subject of a contract. Three persons claiming to be the reversionary heirs of a Hindu widow and being uncertain as to whether she had an absolute or only a qualified estate agreed that she should hold the estate as an absolute owner, but that on her death they should all succeed to her. The widow alienated the property to the defendant whereupon the three claimants sued for cancellation of the alienation, but the defendant pleaded an estoppel and their agreement against them, but the Privy Council held that there was no estoppel and even assuming that the arrangement pleaded amounted to a contract between the plaintiff's predecessors and the defendant's alienor, such a contract was not binding on them. The plaintiff's predecessors were then but expectant heirs with a spes successionis. The plaintiffs claimed in their own right as heirs of the widow when the succession opened and it would be a novel proposition to hold that a person so claiming is bound by a contract made by every person through whom he traced his descent. (6)

2134. Analagous Law.—The following texts bear on the subject of this section:—

Baudhayan :—A woman is not entitled to inherit for thus says the Veda—Females and persons deficient in the organ of senses are deemed incompetent to inherit. (1)

Dayabhag :—Accordingly (since they i. e., females are excluded) Baudhayan, after premising "A woman is entitled 'proceeds' not to the heritage, for females and persons deficient in an organ of sense or member, are deemed incompetent to inherit" The construction of this passage is a 'woman is not entitled to heritage'. But the succession of the widow and certain others [viz., the daughter, the mother and the paternal grandmother] takes effect under express texts, without any contradiction to this maxim. (2)

Viramitrodaya also interprets the vedic text to be limited only to those women whose right of inheritance has not been expressly declared. (3)

2135. It has already been seen before that in the patriarchal society women had no place except as chattels. Manu does not recognize the claim of Bandhus to succession. Yajnavalkya was the first to admit women in the line of heirs, and the Mitakshara further enlarged their rights by even making them fresh stocks of descent. But this view was not acceptable to the courts who have held the text as not in conformity with usage. It is now the accepted doctrine of all schools and held by all courts (4) that except when authorized by express texts or local usage women are as a rule incompetent to inherit. But the disqualification is purely personal and does not affect their sons. So while the sister (5) the uncle's daughter, brother's daughter, nephew's daughter, son's daughter (6) or a daughter's daughter (7) are excluded from inheritance, their sons inherit in their own right though not through their mothers.

The exceptional case of express texts and local usage will be considered in the sequel.

- (a) Congenital blindness, deafness and dumbness.

2136. Analogous Law.—The section is supported by the following texts:

Baudhayan :—See text cited under last section

Manu :—Eunuchs and outcastes, persons born blind or deaf, madmen, idiots, the dumb and such as have lost the use of a limb are excluded from a share of the heritage. (1)

Narad :—An enemy to his father, an outcaste, an impotent person and one who is addicted to vice takes no share of the inheritance even though they be legitimate : much less, if they be sons of the wife by an appointed kinsman. (2)

Yājñavalkya :—An impotent person, an outcaste and his issue, one lame, a madman, an idiot, a blindman, and a person afflicted with an incurable disease as well as others similarly disqualified must be maintained, excluding them however from participation. (3)

S. 2. of the Hindu Widow's Remarriage Act (XV of 1856) enacts as follows :—

All rights and interest which any widow may have in her deceased husband's property by way of maintenance, or by inheritance to her husband or to his lineal successors, or by virtue of any will or testamentary disposition conferring upon her, without express permission to remarry, only a limited interest in such property with no power of alienating the same, shall upon her re-marriage, cease and determine as if she has then died, and the next heirs of her deceased husband or other persons entitled to the property on her death shall thereupon succeed to the same.

2137. Disqualified heirs.—The several mental and physical defects disqualifying a person from inheritance are based upon the vedic text which declares "Females and persons deficient in the organ of senses are deemed incompetent to inherit." The reason is obvious. They took no hand in fighting and therefore took no hand in the estate (§§ 27-29).

Of these it has been held that in order to disqualify, the blindness, deafness and dumbness must be both congenital <sup>(2)</sup> and incurable. <sup>(3)</sup> The Mitakshara describes the blind as

Blindness, deafness and dumbness.

"destitute of the visual organ" <sup>(4)</sup> i.e. he must be stone blind.

2139. Want of limb or organ.—This must be such as to amount to serious physical disability. So in the Dayabhag it is said that the disqualifying lameness must be such as "one cannot walk." <sup>(5)</sup> It must be also congenital. <sup>(6)</sup>

Cl. (1) (b).

2140. Lunacy and idiocy.—The Mitakshara comments on the term "madman" as one affected by any of the various sorts of insanity, proceeding from air, bile or phlegm, from delirium or from planetary influence; and, an "idiot" as a person deprived of the internal faculty; meaning one incapable of discriminating right from wrong. <sup>(7)</sup> It has been held that these definitions harmonize with the English view of lunacy and idiocy <sup>(8)</sup> according to which idiocy is non compos mentis but does not imply utter mental darkness.

Cl. (1) (c).

2141. In order to disqualify, the lunacy or idiocy need not be congenital <sup>(9)</sup> or incurable. <sup>(10)</sup> But then it must at least be idiocy and not a mere weakness of intellect, dullness or stupidity. <sup>(11)</sup> In one case a boy bordering on idiocy was allowed to transmit a heritable right to his widow. <sup>(12)</sup> In the case of co-parcenary property where the interest of a co-parcener vests immediately on his birth the case would be different. If he then suffered from no disability, the estate would vest in him and what vested in him then could not be divested by his subsequent disability. A lunatic though disqualified to inherit is not disqualified to possess property of which he is possessed. <sup>(13)</sup>

2142. Leprosy.—In order to disqualify a person from inheritance the leprosy must be of a virulent form. <sup>(14)</sup> It is only the case of agonizing, sanious or ulcerous type of leprosy that creates the disqualification. <sup>(15)</sup> A person suffering from the anæsthetic form of leprosy, though considered incurable by medical men, is not disentitled to inherit. "Both the texts of the Hindu Law and the decided cases fully establish that it is only the agonizing, sanious or ulcerous type of leprosy that can be regarded as a ground of exclusion. It may be that it is only that type that was regarded as incurable by the Hindu writers. It is not safe to adopt the test whether the disease is curable or not. That is very much a matter of opinion, on which the medical profession itself might be divided. The test would moreover be an indefinite one for legal purposes as what is at one time regarded as curable may at other times be regarded as incurable. Deformity and unfitness for social intercourse arising from the virulent and disgusting nature of the disease would appear to be what has been accepted in both the texts and the decisions as the most satisfactory tests." (1) But however practical or convenient, this was not the shastric test, which seems to have regarded the disability as arising from permanent disability, which is clear from the concluding clause "other incurable disease" which seems to suggest that all other disabilities must be of a like nature.

2143. Impotency.—Procreation of a son being the one desirable purpose of life, impotency was naturally regarded as a serious disqualification and eunuchs were debarred of all civil rights. The impotency may of course be both congenital and incurable. In this and similar cases, the courts require the very clearest proof of the disease before decreeing disinherison. (2)

2144. Other incurable diseases.—The other incurable diseases must be point of seriousness ejusdem generis, that is to say, they must be of such a malignant type as to put the sufferer out of count as a member of society. (3) In one case the disease alleged was the "drying up of the bones", some kind of atrophy but the plea failed for want of cogent evidence. (4) It has been held the disqualifying disease must be beyond the skill of medical science. Dropsy as such is not an incurable disease, nor is so a nasal tumour. (5)

2145. Unchastity.—The following texts bear on the subject of unchastity as a ground for exclusion.

Yridhamanu :—The widow of a childless man keeping unsullied her husband's bed and persevering in religious observances shall present his funeral oblation and obtain his entire share. (6)

Katsyān :—Let the childless widow keeping unsullied the bed of her lord and abiding with her venerable protector, enjoy with moderation the property until her death.

2146. Other texts letting in other females do not refer to their chastity, which only occurs in the case of the widow. It is consequently held that it is a condition applicable only to the widow and not to all female heirs. (7) But the contrary has been held in Bengal (1) on the authority of Raghunandan "a high authority in the Bengal school" which the Madras court refused to follow. (2) But in Bombay, the Bengal view was supported on the ground that since unchastity is either a vice or results in excommunication the woman is incompetent to inherit in any and every capacity. (3)

2147. Unchastity does not dissolve the marital tie (4) but is a disqualification for the wife's succession to her husband (5) unless it was condoned by him. (6) Unchastity does not, however, debar a woman from inheriting the stridhan property of her female relatives. (7) According to the Bengal school unchastity is a ground for disinheriting a daughter (8) but the disqualification is stated to be limited to the widow, being inapplicable to other female relations. e.g., the mother. (9) But the Privy Council in one case said: "It seems clear, however, that though an unchaste daughter is excluded from inheriting her father's estate, or an unchaste mother that of her son, it is not by virtue of either of the above mentioned texts of Vrihat Manu or Katyayan." (10)

2148. Murderous heir.—On the subject of other grounds for exclusion, the Mitakshara discourses as follows:—

Mitakshara.—Under the term "others" are comprehended one who has entered into an order of devotion, an enemy to his father, a sinner in an inferior degree...Narad also declares "An enemy to his father, an outcaste, an impotent person and one who is addicted to vice, takes no share of the inheritance even though they be legitimate much less if they be sons of the wife by an appointed kinsmen." (11)

2149. Whatever may be the literal value of these virtuous precepts, it has been held that the precept is not altogether destitute of legal value. In one case the son was sought to be excluded on the ground that he was extravagant, disobedient and rebellious, gambled and had prostitutes in his keeping; whereupon the court said: "We observe that the evidence given of the plaintiff's gambling and licentious propensities is of a vague and general character and not such as would allow us to conclude that he has disqualified himself by "addiction to vice" for the performance of obsequies and such like acts of religion. In like manner we observe that, although he is shown to have quarrelled with his father, and on the occasion referred to by the witnesses to have forgotten himself so far as to have struck him, the evidence would not pronounce him a professed enemy of his father. The evidence does not disclose anything like habitual maltreatment or active and malignant hostility. We think, therefore, that the texts quoted by the Subordinate Judge, which are understood to have become obsolete in practice, are not applicable in the case before us .." (1)

2150. But this was not the view of the earlier courts. A case arose in 1836 when the son on attaining his majority sued for recovery of his father's estate from his mother who held it during his minority. The mother pleaded that the son had forfeited all right of inheritance in the property he sued for, "in consequence of his having falsely and maliciously accused her on oath of profligate and disgraceful conduct" of which she was judicially acquitted. Thereupon the court consulted its pandits who opined on the authority of the Shastras that the son's conduct was sufficient to disqualify him from inheriting the property of either parent. The son appealed to the Sudar Divani Adalat who again consulted the Pandits who regarded the false accusation as an expiable sin whereupon the court held that the plaintiff could not inherit the disputed property until he had performed such penances as the shastries prescribed, for the offence to decency and morality of which he had been guilty. (2)

2151. More recently it has been held that a person who has been a party to the murder of another cannot succeed to his estate. (3) All that he can claim is maintenance. (4)

2153. Ascetics.—The texts already cited (6) debar a person who has abandoned the world from claiming as an heir. So Vashisth says: "Those who have changed the domestic order and entered into another are debarred from shares." (7) Referring to this Nilkanth says that this means that the person must have entered the order of perpetual student, hermit or ascetic. The fact that a person is a Bairagi, has however been held to be no ground for exclusion, since Bairagis still pursue secular occupations. (8) And since a Shudra cannot enter the order of Yati or Sanyasi a Shudra who becomes an ascetic is not excluded from inheritance to his family estate unless some usage is proved to the contrary. The texts applicable to the disinheritance of ascetics do not apply to Shudras (9) There are degrees in asceticism and it does not follow that a man by becoming an ascetic has so completely renounced the world as to make himself incapable of taking an inheritance. It has been held that his becoming a Fakir entails that disability (10), and that the burden of proving otherwise is upon him. (11) But it is submitted that he who relies upon the disqualification must prove it. It has been doubted whether a Gossain forfeits his secular estate by becoming an ascetic.<sup>(1)</sup> Gossains marry and their marriage has not the necessary effect of entailing forfeiture of their office and of its appendant property and rights.<sup>(2)</sup>

2156. Customary variation.—Though contract cannot,<sup>(14)</sup> custom may modify the law of succession. As such, custom vests the Jain widow with absolute rights by inheritance.<sup>(15)</sup> On the other hand, custom is sometimes severe on the daughters excluding them altogether from succession.<sup>(16)</sup> Whatever may be its effect, a custom which has the effect of varying the law, must like all customs, be strictly proved.<sup>(17)</sup> But sometimes as in the case of impartible estates, the custom that they are as regards succession, subject to the rule of primogeniture has become a fact of sufficient notoriety to be presumed till the contrary is shown.<sup>(18)</sup>

2157. Pleading.—Since succession is the rule and exclusion an exception, he who relies upon an exclusion by reason of any disability must establish it by clear evidence. He must not only prove a disability but the disability pleaded by him must be, shewn to be such as justifies the exclusion. A stranger cannot attack the plaintiff's title unless he has himself a valid title to the estate. Where the defendant pleaded a will in answer to the plaintiff's suit based upon his inheritance it is for him to establish the will without which he would be a trespasser and as such not entitled to defeat the plaintiff by throwing on him the burden of proving his title free from infirmity at the time when the succession opened. (1) The fact that he was suffering from it at the time of the suit does not prove his disqualification to inherit which must be established at the moment the succession opened (2). It is only a person with a superior right that can disturb another in possession of property (3). A person with defective title may perfect it by adverse possession.

238. When an heir is disqualified, the next heir of the deceased succeeds but the disqualified heir is entitled to maintenance for himself and his family.

2158. Analogous Law.—The following texts support the rule stated in the section:—

Mitakshara:—The disinherision of the persons above described seeming to imply disinherision of their sons, the author adds: "But their sons, whether legitimate, or the offspring of the wife by a kinsmen are entitled to allotments if free from similar defects. (4)

Dayabhag:—When the father is dead (as well as in his lifetime) an impotent man, blind man etc., are not competent to share the heritage. Food and raiment should be given to them, excepting the outcaste. But the sons of such persons, being free from similar defects, shall obtain their father's shares of the inheritance (5)

2159. Effect of Exclusion upon Inheritance.—The effect of exclusion of an heir upon inheritance is that the excluded heir receives maintenance charged on the estate, and the succession devolves upon the next heir as if he were dead or had relinquished his right. (6) It is immaterial that the next heir claims through him, since the incapacity being personal does not taint the blood. (7) Consequently, the wife or widow of a disqualified person is not incapable of inheriting property merely by reason of her husband's disqualification whether she claims as heir to a deceased person through her husband or otherwise, if she is herself free from any of the defects which excludes a person from inheritance. (8)

2160. Maintenance of excluded heir.—The excluded heir and his family are provided with maintenance as a solatium for loss of inheritance. The subject has been already considered in S. 77.

CHAPTER XXII.

ORDER OF THE MITAKSHARA INHERITANCE TO MALES.

Classification of Sapindas.

239. (1) Sápindas are of two classes: (a) Gotraj and (b) Bandhus.

(2) Gotraj comprise Gotraj Sapinda and Samanodaks who are the preferential heirs, failing whom the succession devolves on the Bandhus.

(3) Among the Gotraj Sapindas the nearest Sapinda succeeds provided the deceased and his heir were related to each other as Sapindas and provided further that the Sapinda who was joint with the deceased is preferred to other Sapindas of the same class, except in the case of brothers and sons of brothers among whom no distinction is made between persons of the whole blood and those of the half blood.

Explanation.—Legitimate sons by different mothers succeed equally to the property of their father. <sup>(1)</sup>

Exception.—The rule as to propinquity stated in clause 3 does not apply to the issue of the owner as defined in S. 50 who inherit by representation.

The Mitakshara <sup>(3)</sup> and the Mayukh <sup>(4)</sup> contain a more elaborate dissertations on the subject which will be presently examined.

2163. Analogous Law.—Both Manu, Yajnavalkya and his commentator Vijyaneshwar first enumerate the particular heirs and then generally lay down the order of succession in the following texts :—

Manu :—187. To the nearest Sapinda, male or female, after him in the third degree, the inheritance next belongs ; then on failure of Sapindas and of the issue, the Samanodakas or distant kinsmen shall be the heir : or the spiritual preceptor or the pupil or the fellow student, of the deceased.

188. On failure of all those, the lawful heirs are such brahmins as have read the three vedas, as are pure in body and mind, as have subdued their passions ; and they must consequently offer the cake ; thus the rites of obsequies cannot fail.

189. The property of a Brahman shall never be taken as an escheat by the king ; this is a fixed law ; but the wealth of the other classes, on failure of all heirs, the king may take (1).

Yajnavalkya :—185-186. (After stating that the son inherits continues.) The wife, daughters, both parents, brothers, and likewise their sons, Gotrajs, bandhus, a pupil and a fellow student, on these on failure of the preceding, the next following in order is heir to the estate of one who has departed for heaven, leaving no putra. This rule extends to all [males whether belonging or not to the four] classes.

187. The heirs who take the wealth of a hermit (Vanapurasth) of an ascetic (Yati) and a student (Brahmchari) are in their order, the preceptor, the virtuous pupil, and one who is a supposed brother and belonging to the same order

188. A re-united co-heir (takes the wealth) of a united co-heir (and) a uterine brother (that) of a uterine brother (The re-united brother) shall give up the wealth of the deceased to one born (of his body) or (failing one such,) shall retain it.

189. One born of a different mother, if reunites, may take the wealth : but one born of a different mother and not re-united (cannot take,) but a uterine brother even if not re-united should obtain the wealth and one born of a different mother, even if re-united, shall not take alone (2).

Mitakshara :—1. That sons, principal and secondary, take the heritage has been shown. The order of succession among all (tribes and classes) on failure of them, is next declared. (Here cites Yaj II-185, 186 quoted supra)

5. In the first place the wife shares the estate. Wife (patni) signifies a woman espoused in lawful wedlock : conformably with the etymology of the term as implying a connection with religious rites.

6. Yridh Manu also declares the widow's right to the whole estate. "The widow of a childless man keeping unsullied her husband's bed, and persevering in religious observances, shall present his funeral oblation and obtain (his) entire estate."

II-II-1. On failure of her, the daughters inherit (Rest of the chapter explanatory of this term. II-II-1 On failure of these heirs the two parents meaning the mother and the father, are successors to the property (Rest explanatory)

II-IV-1. On failure of the father, brethren share the estate, (Rest explanatory).

7. On failure of brothers also, their sons share the heritage in the order of the respective fathers.

8. In case of competition between brothers and nephews, the nephews have no title to the succession ; for the right of intertance is declared to be on failure of brothers. ("both parents, brothers likewise, and their sons")

9. However when a brother has died leaving no male issue (nor other nearer heir) and, the estate has consequently devolved on his brothers indifferently, if any one of them die before a partition of their brother's estate takes place, his sons do in that case acquire a title through their father and it is fit, therefore, that a share should be allotted to them, in their father's right at a subsequent distribution of the property between them and the surviving brothers.

II-V-1. If there be not even brother's sons, agnates share the estate. Agnates are the paternal grandmother and relations connected by funeral oblations of food and libations of water (Sapindas and Samanodaks) (3).

II-VII-1. On failure of agnates, the cognates are heirs. (4)

II-VII-1. If there be no bandhus of the deceased, the preceptor or, on the failure of him, the pupil, inherits under the text of Apastamb. "If there be no male issue, the nearest Sapinda inherits : or, in default of kindred, the preceptor ; or failing him the disciple." (1) (Then follow the pupil, the fellow student and priest and in the case of a non-Brahmin the King " and not a priest may take the estate of a Kshatriya or other person of an inferior caste on failure of heirs down to the fellow-student.")

Mayukh contains a long disquisition on the same lines (2).

The Mitakshara mentions the following particular heirs, (i) son, (ii) son's son, (iii) son's son's son, (iv) widow, (3) daughter (vi) daughter's son (vii) mother (viii) father (ix) brother (x) brother's, son which concludes what it calls "the compact series of heirs" i. e. those whose order is "fixed," the rights of the rest being "after the manner of the entry of intruders who are placed at the end" (4).

Right of Issue.

241. The issue of the deceased inherit in accordance with the following rules :—

(1) When there are more than one son, whether by the same or different mothers, they take equal shares.

(2) Sons who were joint with their father at the time of his decease inherit to the exclusion of those who were separate.

(3) Grandsons of a predeceased son inherit in the right of their father taking per stirpes and not per capita.

(4) An adopted son of the deceased inherits the whole estate. But where the deceased has left an auras son him surviving, the adopted son takes one fifth of the share of an auras son as provided in S. 50 (4).

(5) The illegitimate son of a twice born does not inherit to his putative father. But the son of a Shudra inherits to the same extent as a legitimate son provided that he was born of a continuous concubine intercourse with whom was neither incestuous nor adulterous. Provided further, that where a Shudra father has sons both legitimate and illegitimate, the latter takes half the share of a legitimate son in default of whom he inherits the whole ; but he has otherwise no right to collateral succession. He shares equally with the widow and the daughter's son.

2165. Son.—Of all the Sapindas the son is the nearest. He naturally succeeds to his father and if there are more sons than one, they all take equally, whether they were born of the same or different mothers. (1) The term "Son" must in this connection be understood to be a loose paraphrase of "putra" which is used in the Mitakshara and its commentary the Subodhini as a generic term for male issue or descendants including the grandson and the great grandson. (2) Consequently, the son of a deceased son would share equally with a living son the self-acquired property of his grand father. (3) Sons who were joint with their father exclude those who had separated (4) on the principle that those who have gone out of the family cannot have the same right as those who have remained within it (5) who have not received their share and were probably in union with the father at the time of his death (6) (§ 2168).

2166. Illegitimate sons were at one time on a par with legitimate sons (7) but, except in the case of Shudras, they have no right now beyond a bare right of maintenance. (8) As the Mitakshara puts it, "From the mention of Shudra in this place" (9) it follows that the son begotten by a man of a regenerate tribe on a female slave does not obtain a share even by the father's choice, nor the whole estate after his demise. But if he be docile he receives a simple maintenance. (10) The son has no greater right because the father was himself illegitimate or belonged to a mixed class between the second and third of the regenerate classes. (11)

So the illegitimate son of a Kshatriya one of the regenerate castes by a woman of the Shudra <sup>(1)</sup> or any other caste, e.g., a Kshatriya woman <sup>(2)</sup> cannot in the absence of custom <sup>(3)</sup> succeed to his putative father, <sup>(4)</sup> the reason for exclusion being that law does not recognize the status of the issue when the intercourse between its parents was in violation of or forbidden by law, <sup>(5)</sup>

2167. The contrary was laid down in a case on the principle of equity and good conscience, in which one Khuman a Brahmin was outcasted for co-habiting with a Bania widow. He left his home with the widow, acquired property which on his death passed to the widow and his natural son from whom Khuman's brothers claimed possession but their suit was dismissed on the ground that on his excommunication from his caste Khuman must be deemed to have started a separate family altogether and that his brothers were therefore equitably not entitled to dispossess his son. <sup>(6)</sup> This reasoning is not convincing for the fact that Khuman's excommunication did not snap the tie of relationship between him and his brothers who as his nearest Sapindas were entitled to inherit in the absence of a nearer relation. An illegitimate person has no right to succeed to the property of another illegitimate collateral <sup>(7)</sup>

Yajnavalkya.—Even a son begotten by a Shudra on a female slave may take a share by the father's choice. But if the father be dead, the brethren should make him partaker of the moiety of a share and one who has no brothers may inherit the whole property in default of a daughter's son. <sup>(8)</sup>

Mitakshara.—(Quoting the last) 2. The son begotten by a Shudra on a female slave (Dasi Putra) <sup>(9)</sup> obtains a share by the father's choice or at his pleasure. But after the demise of the father, if there be sons of a wedded wife, let those brothers allow the son of the female slave to participate for half a share, that is, let them give him half as much as is the amount of one brother's allotment. However should there be no sons of a wedded wife, the son of the female slave takes the whole estate provided there is no daughter of a wife nor sons of daughters. But if there be such, the son of the female slave participates for half a share only. <sup>(10)</sup>

2169. With the abolition of slavery a Dasi Putra as such has ceased to exist but that term must now be taken to mean the son of a permanent concubine

(9) Jolly regards "dasi" to include any unmarried Shudra. Jolly's H.L. of Partition P. 189. But it is submitted that though Shudras were called Dasyas, the contextual meaning in the following texts leaves no doubt that the term was primarily applied to the "son by a female slave". Manu IX-179; Mit. I-XII-13; May. IV-IV-32; Dayakram Sangrah VI-32 33; Datt. Mim. II-80; Datt. Ch. V. 80; Jagannath Charka Panchanan V-III-174 Kalluka Bhatt defines a female slave as one captured in a battle and one of the seven kinds of slaves mentioned by Manu VIII 415. So in Datt. Mim. IV 76 the author says: "A female purchased for price and enjoyed or co-habited with is termed by former sages a slave. The son who is born of her is considered a dasi putra." See Datti v. Datti, 4 M. H. C. R. 204 (208), Krishnayyan v. Muttu-sami, 7 M. 407 (411).

(10) Mit. I-XII-1, 2.

or a mistress as distinguished from the son of a casual connection. (1) The intercourse is necessarily immoral but it must not be illegal. Consequently the son of an incestuous or (2) an adulterous intercourse with a married woman (8) or by a Shudra widow whose re-marriage is forbidden (4) is disqualified.

2170. So the illegitimate son of a Shudra being the offspring of an incestuous intercourse between a father-in-law and his daughter-in-law is not entitled to inherit his father's estate. (5) So again it has been held that a son born of a woman of the Shudra caste amongst whom re-marriage is prohibited will entail the same disability upon the issue, (6) but the reason for this view is not apparent and the fact that concubinage led to excommunication is never the test for disinheriting the issue.

2172. He is entitled to the same share in competition with the legitimate daughter.<sup>(1)</sup> In Madras he was held entitled to an equal share with the daughter's son,<sup>(2)</sup> but the remark is casual and opposed to the express text.<sup>(3)</sup> His right as against the widow is held to be similar,<sup>(4)</sup> though there are cases in which he is to take to the exclusion of the widow who is merely entitled to maintenance as in the case of a legitimate son,<sup>(5)</sup> but it is argued on the other side that the texts are silent on the point, probably because the widow's right is a later development but from the fact that in competition with the daughter who takes after the widow such son gets only one-half, there is no reason why he should exclude the widow whose right is greater but in no case less than that of the daughter.<sup>(6)</sup> In the Dattak Chandrika her right is stated to exist.<sup>(7)</sup> Even those who oppose the widow's right admit the force of this reasoning but consider it to be "one of those arbitrary arrangements not uncommon in Hindu Law."<sup>(8)</sup>

But assuming that the illegitimate son cannot exclude the widow, the question still remains as to what share he is entitled. In Madras relying on the authority of Dattak Chandrika he is held to share equally with her<sup>(9)</sup> and down to the daughter's son, after which he takes the whole to the exclusion of other heirs.<sup>(10)</sup>

2174. An illegitimate son has not the same position as an adopted son. As compared with the adopted son, the illegitimate son's position is certainly inferior. The adopted son has a co-ordinate interest with his father in ancestral property. He can claim partition from his father. He represents his father as against the father's co-parceners. He excludes the widow, the daughter and the daughter's son. In ancient law he was one of the twelve descriptions of sons whereas the illegitimate son as the son of a female slave had no place amongst them.<sup>(14)</sup> If the adopted son takes a smaller share in competition with the legitimate son it is because he is a mere substitute provided by a fiction of law whilst in the case of the "auras" there is actual blood relationship consecrated by a legal marriage. In default of a legal marriage the fiction operated as a special rule of law to give the adopted son the same status in the family as against every one of its members on the other hand. Save as to taking an inferior share there is no analogy between him and the illegitimate son. (1)

2177. After the great grandson, comes the widow whose right to inherit is expressly provided by all the smritikars, (5) with the following refrain.—“The widow of a childless man preserving unsullied the bed of her lord and persevering in religious observances shall present his funeral oblation and obtain his entire share.” (6) Her right to inherit her husband's estate has been recognised in numerous cases. (7) On marriage the wife assumes the Gotra of her husband and she is classed amongst his Gotraj Sapindas, (8) (§ 664) though the term Gotraj is strictly speaking confined only to the agnatic kinsman. (9) When there is more than one widow all take jointly as a single heir with the right of partition and survivorship, (1) (§§ 1420-1426) which she may however relinquish in favour of the co-widow but such relinquishment cannot extend beyond her life-interest. (2) It has already been stated that the interest which the widow acquires is liable to be divested by the birth or adoption of a son (S. 34).

(5) Daughter.

2178. The daughter ranks next to the widow as provided in the following text :—

Mitakshara :—1. On failure of her (i. e. the wife) the daughters inherit. They are named in the plural number (3) to suggest the equal or unequal participation of daughters alike or dissimilar by class.

2. Thus Katyayan says "Let the widow succeed to her husband's wealth provided she be chaste and in default of her, let the daughters inherit if unmarried. Also Brihaspati :— "The wife is pronounced successor to the wealth of her husband and in her default the daughter. As a son, so does the daughter of a man proceed from his several limbs. How then should any other person take her father's wealth."

3. If there be competition between a married and unmarried daughter, the unmarried one takes the succession under the special provisions of the text above cited (in default of her, let the daughter inherit, if unmarried).

4. If the competition be between the unprovided and enriched daughter the unprovided one inherits but on the failure of such, the enriched one succeeds for the text of Gautam is equally applicable to the paternal as to the maternal estate. "A woman's separate property goes to her daughter's unmarried or unprovided" (4).

2179. It is clear from these texts that though daughters as a class rank after the widow, (5) the grounds of preference between them inter se are that the unmarried excludes the married (6) the poor daughter the rich, that is to say the competition is only as between the married and unmarried and the rich and the poor. Consequently the unmarried daughter excludes the married daughter whether she be rich or poor. (7) In default of unmarried daughters, the married daughter succeeds and amongst them the poor excludes the rich, (8) whatever may have been the source of her wealth whether from her husband or from her father or otherwise. (9) Now what is the test of poverty? It has been held that comparative poverty is the sole test for settling the claims of daughters amongst themselves but the court should not go into minute details since all that it has to enquire is whether there is such marked difference between the wealth of the two, that one should be called poor in comparison with the other. (10) Under the Dayabhag law the capacity to produce a Sapinda is the sole cause of her daughter's succession. (11) Hence a barren daughter or one who is not likely to have male issue or who is already a childless widow is not entitled to succeed but no such distinction exists in the Mitakshara. (1) But though the poor sister excludes the rich she does not become a fresh stock of descent but on her death the rich sister succeeds to her in preference to the poor sister's son. (3) In Bengal the latter would exclude the sister, (4) while in Bombay the same rule prevails, since the daughter there takes absolutely and on her death her own heirs will succeed (5) and the same rule extends to Berar which is a disciple of the Bombay school (6) and Sindh. (7)

2180. Illegitimate daughters whether of a twice born or of a Shudra have no right of inheritance. The illegitimate son of a Shudra succeeds because his case is covered by a special text. (8) There is no text to favour an illegitimate daughter. In one case it was contended that the texts applicable to the son applied equally to the daughter, since the word "son" included the daughter, but this contention was of course not acceded to. (9) The texts do not favour the claims of females generally and they now only allow the claims of those expressly named. As such the texts mention the daughter, but while they expressly allude to an illegitimate son they nowhere mention an illegitimate daughter which implies that illegitimate daughters were conceded no right. But illegitimate daughters are entitled to inherit to their mothers. (10)

2181. Unchastity is no bar to a daughter's inheritance (11) but a prostitute cannot be regarded as an "unprovided maiden" entitled to inherit in preference to her married sister. (12) Being neither a maiden nor married she will inherit only in default of either unmarried or married sisters. (13) But it is submitted that there is no textual support for this view and that the conclusion reached is the result of reasoning which can only be justified on the ground of equity.

2182. A daughter may be excluded by custom. Such a custom has been successfully pleaded in several cases relating to several races such as the Bhale Sultan tribe of Kshatriyas (14) and the Jangra Chauhans (15) of Oudh. In the latter case it was contended that the evidence of custom as to impartible estate was inadmissible to prove it as regards the ordinary partible property. But the Privy Council held the distinction untenable. Similar customs excluding daughters have been successfully proved in the case of utpat families of Pandharpur <sup>(1)</sup> Chudasama Gamati Garasias <sup>(2)</sup> and the Bhagars in the Broach Collectorate. <sup>(3)</sup> In the case of Gobel Girasias the custom was held proved by the trial judge but the High Court reversed him holding that the District Judge was wrong in holding the custom proved from the absence of a single instance in which the daughter had inherited; whereas the real issue was were there sufficiently numerous instances of her exclusion. <sup>(4)</sup> In another case the case for exclusion was held rebutted by proof of a large number of instances of daughters inheriting. <sup>(5)</sup>

It will be seen in the sequel that except in Bombay, the daughter takes a limited estate and on her death the estate devolves on the next heir of the father. <sup>(6)</sup>

(6) Daughter's son. 2183. The following text supports the succession of the daughter's son :—

Yishnu :—On failure of sons, and of their male issue, the sons of daughters shall obtain the property: for the male offspring of a son of a daughter are equally qualified to perform obsequies for men of all classes. <sup>(7)</sup>

The daughter's son is a bandhu and not a Gotra Sapinda, though he ranks before the parents of the deceased for the purpose of succession. But this is so by special texts <sup>(8)</sup> due to his history. Under the old law failing a son a daughter might be appointed by the father to raise up issue to him and the son born is called a "putrika-putra" or the son of the (appointed) daughter. In early times such son was treated as an auras or self-begotten son. In course of time the practice of appointment fell into disuse but the special position which he had attained remained. The daughter's son is competent to perform the Shradh of his maternal grandfather <sup>(9)</sup> and Yajnaalkya mentions him as an heir. <sup>(10)</sup> Vishnu regards him as equal to a son's son and supports his claim in the text before cited. The daughter's son has no right of inheritance in his maternal grandfather's estate so long as the estate vests in his mother. <sup>(11)</sup> He is the reversioner whose estate comes into being on the daughter's death. <sup>(12)</sup> But they are nevertheless entitled to protect their reversionary rights against an improper alienation made by their mother <sup>(13)</sup> the cause of action arising on the date of alienation. <sup>(14)</sup> Sons jointly inheriting to their maternal grandfather on the death of their mother have the right of survivorship <sup>(15)</sup> and except under the Mayukh, they take per capita and not per stirpes. <sup>(16)</sup>

2184. A daughter's son may succeed though the daughter be disqualified. (1) But if the daughter's son predeceases his maternal grandfather his son cannot inherit in the right of his father (2) though he will succeed in his own right as a bandhu. "A daughter's son, on whom the inheritance has actually fallen takes it as full owner and thereupon he becomes a new stock of descent and on his death the succession passes to his heir and not back again to the heir of his grandfather. (3) But until the death of the last daughter capable of being an heiress he takes no interest whatever and therefore can transmit none. Therefore, if he should die before the last of such daughters, leaving a son, that son would not succeed, because he belonged to a different family and he would offer no oblation to the maternal grandfather of his own father." (4)

An impartible property will pass on the death of all daughters to the eldest surviving son. (5)

(7) Mother

2185. The following texts bear on the subject of her right.

Manu:—Of him, who leaves no son, the father shall take the inheritance and the brothers. (6)

Mitakshara:—Besides, the father is the common parent to other sons but the mother is not so; and since her propinquity is consequently greatest, it is fit that she should take the estate in the first instance conformably with the text "To the nearest Sapinda, the inheritance next belongs." (7)

Mayukh:—In default of daughter's son comes the father in default of him, the mother. (8)

It will be seen that while the Mitakshara places the mother before the father, the Mayukh reverses the order and this preference for the father has been given effect to in Guzerat on the ground "that the majority of eminent Hindu writers give the preference to the father over the mother." (9) But in the Ratnagiri district where the Mitakshara is pre-eminent the mother was held to inherit before the father. (10) The mother like all females will take only a limited estate and on her death the estate will devolve on the son's heir. (11)

2186. On the general principle that females are excluded from succession unless expressly mentioned in the texts the stepmother has no place in the table of succession. She cannot, therefore succeed to her step-son. (12) And for the same reason a step-grandmother is not the heir of her step-grandson. (13)

2187. But though the step-mother cannot succeed as mother, she may still succeed in Bombay as a widow of her husband and as such his Gotraj Sapinda.<sup>(1)</sup> As such she is held to be preferable to the widow of the half brother<sup>(2)</sup> and the widow of a first cousin ex paterna of the deceased propositus was preferred to a fifth male cousin<sup>(3)</sup> and in another case she was held to succeed to her step-son in preference to her step-son's paternal uncle's son<sup>(4)</sup> on the principle that the widows of Gotraj Sapindas in the case of collaterals are to be preferred to the male Gotrajs in a more remote line, and a fortiori the widow of a male Gotraj in the ascending line should be preferred to such collateral<sup>(5)</sup> As West and Buhler put it "The step mother ought to be placed on account of her near relationship to the deceased immediately after the paternal grandmother up to whom only the succession is settled by special texts."<sup>(6)</sup>

2188. It has already been stated before that the father takes before the mother under the Mayukh. Otherwise he follows her.<sup>(7)</sup>

(8) Father. The step-father has of course no place in the Hindu table of succession. Even the wife who re-marries forfeits her husband's inheritance so that her son cannot lay any claim to his father's estate.

2189. After the father, come the brothers, those of the whole blood being preferred to those of the half blood. The following texts support him.

(9) Brother.

Mitakshara :—On failure of the father, the brothers share the estate. Accordingly Manu says "of him who, leaves no son the father shall take the inheritance or the brothers."<sup>(8)</sup>

5. Among brothers, such as are of the whole blood, take the inheritance in the first instance under the text before cited "To the nearest Sapinda the inheritance next belongs."<sup>(9)</sup> since those of the half blood are remote through the difference of the mothers<sup>(10)</sup>

It will be noted that except in the case of brothers and sons of brothers neither the Mitakshara nor the Mayukh makes any distinction between persons of the whole blood and those of the half blood. Legitimate sons by different mothers take equally the property of their father. The Mitakshara in the succession of brothers, places uterine brothers i.e., brothers of the whole blood before brothers of the half blood. It then brings in brothers of the half blood and places the sons of brothers respectively in the same order as their respective fathers.<sup>(11)</sup> The Mayukh also prefers brothers of the whole blood to brothers of the half blood but next to the brothers of the whole blood brings in their sons.<sup>(12)</sup> It names as next in succession the paternal grandmother, and after her the sister, and after the sister introduces together the paternal grandfather and the half brother and after them the paternal great grandfather, the father's brother and the sons of brothers of the half blood. (1) But so far as brothers of the full and half blood are concerned both the Mitakshara and the Mayukh agree. (2) Of course custom may eliminate the textual difference between brothers of the whole and brothers of the half blood and in one case such custom was sought to be supported upon the strength of an entry in the wajib-ul-arz which the Privy Council ruled out as connoting "the views of individuals as to the practice that they would wish to see prevailing rather than the ascertained fact of a well established custom." (3) But in the Punjab such a custom is presumed in the case of certain tribes. (4)

It has already been seen that there is no relation between the sons of the mother by her first marriage and of those of her second marriage after death or divorce of her first husband. The later Smritis abhor a woman's re-marriage and it would be a far cry to expect them to suffer any relationship between the offspring of a sacramental and those of a sinful union.

2190. As between brothers of the whole blood and those of the half blood those re-united take in preference to those not re-united.
Effect of reunion. But a reunited half brother takes equally with the separated whole brother. In other words---

(1) A whole brother reunited excludes a whole separated brother. Here the relationship being equal the succession is regulated by union.

(2) A whole brother reunited excluded a half brother reunited. Here the union being equal superior relationship rules the succession.

(3) A whole brother separated and a half brother re-united share equally. Here superior relationship without union and union with inferior relationship are equal. (6)

This subject has been already considered elsewhere (S. 152)

2191. The sub-division of brothers into those of the whole blood and those of the half blood extends to their sons, both the
 (10) Brother's Son. Mitakshara and the Mayukh placing sons of brothers of the whole blood before the sons of brothers of the half blood. On this subject the Mitakshara says:—

Mitakshara:—7. On failure of brothers also, their sons share the heritage in the order of the respective fathers

9. However when a brother has died leaving no male issue (nor other nearer heir) and the estate has consequently devolved on his brothers indifferently, if any one of them died before a partition of their father's estate takes place, his sons do in that case acquire a title through their father and it is fit therefore that a share should be allotted to them in their father's right at a subsequent distribution of the property between them and the surviving brothers (1).

Shrikrishna :—In default of brothers, the brother's son is the successor. Here also a nephew of the whole blood inherits in the first instance and on failure of such, the nephew of the half blood but in case of re-union of co heirs and on the supposition of all being of whole blood the associated son of the whole brother is in the first place heir; and on failure of him, the unassociated nephew of the whole blood or on the supposition of all being of the half blood, the associated nephew of the half blood is the first heir and on failure of him, the unassociated nephew. But if the son of the whole brother be separate and the son of the half brother associated, both inherit together, like brothers in similar circumstances" (2)

2192. According to the Mitakshara the nephews do not share with their uncles but take a share which had vested in their father. (3) According to the Mayukh the sons of a deceased brother succeed along with the surviving brothers. (4) The rule is held to extend even to sons of cousins. (5) But this rule cannot be extended to the Mitakshara country without proof of custom. In one case of the Ahban Thakers of Oudh such a custom was pleaded but the Privy Council held the four instances adduced in proof of it to be of a comparatively modern date and insufficient to prove a family custom pleaded in derogation of the ordinary law. (6)

Even in Bombay the rule does not go beyond the brothers and their children. (7)

2193. In an undivided family a brother's son takes his own share as well as the lapsed share of a brother's son in preference to the grandson of another brother. (8) Where for instance A had four grandsons F, G, H, & I of whom I alone was alive at the date of the suit by F's two sons J and K who claimed to divide A's estate in two equal shares claiming a share by survivorship to which I replied that being a nearer Sapinda of G and H he was entitled to inherit their share to the exclusion of J. & K. the court held that inasmuch as F had predeceased both G. & H. their share devolved on I to the exclusion of the plaintiffs. (9) In other words, under the Mitakshara the nephew succeeds not as the heir of his father but as the direct heir of his uncle. (10) As such, brother's sons take per capita and not per stirpes. (11)

The brother's son is the last of what Mitakshara calls the "compact series of heirs." (12)

(12) Paternal grandmother. 2196. The paternal grandmother comes in next. After the brother's son the Mitakshara summarily dismisses the remaining heirs with the following texts:—

Mitakshara:—4. Here on failure of the father's descendants, the heirs are successively the paternal grandmother, the paternal grandfather, the uncles and their sons.

2. On failure of the paternal grandfather's line, the paternal great-grandmother, the great grandfather his sons and their issue inherit. In this manner must be understood the succession of kindred belonging to the same general family and who are Sapindas. <sup>(6)</sup>

Mayukh:—(7) In default of brother's sons [come] the Gotraj Sapindas [gentile relations] Among them first is the paternal grandmother according to the text of Manu <sup>(8)</sup> which says: "And the mother also being dead the father's mother shall take the heritage" <sup>(9)</sup> And although she is to be entered at the end after the brother's sons, after the manner of the entry of intruders who are placed at the end, because she is not mentioned among those whose order of [succession] is fixed ending with brother's sons.

Mayukh:—In default of her [i. e. the paternal grandmother] comes the sister, for says Manu (2) "The wealth of the deceased goes to whoever is next among Sapindas and the rest." And similarly Eribhaspati:—"Where a childless man leaves several clansmen Sakulyas (kinsmen) and Bandhvas (relations), whoever of them is the nearest, takes the wealth of the deceased." Being begotten in her brother's family (gotra), she possesses the qualifications of a Gotraj. The community of Gotra does indeed, not exist in the case of a sister. But the quality of being a Sagotra is not mentioned here as a condition of the right of taking the wealth as heritage. (3)

The sister is not a Gotraj, since on her marriage she assumes the Gotra of her husband. As Westropp, J., observed: "Some of the Bombay shastris have been so far influenced by Nilkanth's play upon the term 'gotra' as to style the sister 'gotraj' as well as Sapinda. The latter opinion seems however to me to be that which would regard her heirship as dependant either on the special mention of her by Brihaspati or Nilkanth or upon the Sapindaship." (4) Whatever may be the logic of her right she has now the established right to heirship after the paternal grandmother in the country subject to the Mayukh.

2199. According to the Mitakshara (5) the paternal grandfather comes immediately after the paternal grandmother. But as already stated the Mayukh postpones him in favour of the sister who intervenes between himself and the paternal grandmother. According to the Mayukh again, he takes equally with the half brother "because their propinquity is equal." (6)
- (13) Paternal grandfather.

2200. The paternal uncle takes next, an uncle of the full blood being preferred to an uncle of the half blood, (7) and the latter to his cousins. (8) According to the Mayukh the paternal uncle shares the inheritance equally with paternal great grandfather, and sons of the half brother. (9)
- (14) Paternal Uncle

The distinction between an uncle of the whole blood and one of the half-blood only applies where the two are related to the deceased in the same degree. That distinction cannot apply when there is a difference in degrees. Consequently, after the paternal grandfather the order of succession will be as follows: paternal uncle of full blood (10) paternal uncle of half blood (11) paternal uncle's son of full blood, paternal uncle's son of half blood (12).

2201. On the ground that the "son" includes also the "grandson" a view now confirmed by the Privy Council (13) a paternal uncle's son cannot succeed in preference to a brother's grandson. The contrary was held in Madras in a case (14) which has been overruled by the Privy Council. (1) A paternal uncle's son is preferable in Bombay to the daughter of a brother (2) for the obvious reason that a Gotraj is always preferable to a bandhu.

2202. On the ground that the term "Son" (putra) is used in its generic sense as comprising the grandson the place of the paternal uncle's grandson is the same as the paternal uncle's son. (3) In this view the great grandson of the grandfather will succeed in preference to the grandson of the great grandfather on the ground that the propinquity of Gotras is to be determined by lines of descent, that is to say, the inheritance is to go first in the Santan or line of the paternal grandfather, then in default of any one in that line of the paternal great grandfather and so forth; that is to say the line of the grandfather must be first exhausted before the great grandfather and his line come in. (4) In this view the three immediate descendants of the grandfather succeed in preference to the great grandfather and his descendants and consequently the great grandson of the grandfather is a preferential heir as against the grandson of the great grandfather.

2203. The remaining heirs though categorized by the Smritikars are seldom liable to be present to take the succession. They are—

- (17) Father's father's mother. (5),
- (18) Father's father's father.
- (19) Father's father's brother.
- (20) Father's father's brother's son.
- (21) Father's father's brother's son's son.

The above order is supported by the following text :—

Mitakshara 5. On failure of the paternal grandfather's line, the paternal grandmother, the great grandfather, his sons and their issue inherit. In this manner must be understood the succession of kindred belonging to the same Gotra and Sapindas. (6)

2204. The Subodhini carries the enumeration of Gotraj Sapindas a little further adding the following :—

- (1) paternal great grandfather's mother,
  - (2) great grandfather's father,
  - (3) great grandfather's brothers and their sons,
  - (4) paternal great grandfather's grandmother,
  - (5) great grandfather's grandfather,
  - (6) great grandfather's uncles and their sons,
- adding—"the same analogy holds in the succession of Samanodaks".

2205. The Mayukh contends for a different series of heirs after the brother's sons :—

- (1) Paternal grandmother.
- (2) Sister.

- (3) Paternal grandfather and brothers of half blood.

It does not pursue the enumeration further, and the principle stated by it, nearness of kin does not clearly indicate the rule of continuation of this series. (1)

2207. Remote Sapinda heirs.—Grandsons in the fourth and fifth removes are Sapindas and heirs to their common ancestors. (4) The text of the Mitakshara is in such cases decisive, unless it can be shown that its plain language has received some qualification or judicial construction. (5) Such are descendants of the deceased from the fourth to the sixth degree:—

- (22) great grandson.
- (23) great great great grandson.

242. The order of succession amongst Samanodaks is

Order of Succession subject to the following rules:
amongst Samanodaks

(1) The nearer line excludes the line more remote ; and

(2) A nearer kinsman excludes a remoter kinsman in the same line.

Synopsis.

- (1) Order of succession among Samanodaks (2208). 2212.)
- (2) Who are Samanodaks (2209-2212). (3) Enumeration of Samanodaks (2212).

2208. Analogous Law.—As to the order of succession amongst Samanodaks, the Mitakshara says:—(After citing Manu) “To the nearest Sapinda the inheritance next belongs.” (1) Nor is the claim in virtue of propinquity restricted to Sapindas; but on the contrary, it appears from this very text that the rule of propinquity is effectual, without any exception, in the case of Samanodaks as well as other relatives when they appear to have a claim to the succession. (2)

The principle of propinquity then amounts to this. The descendants of a nearer ancestor succeed in preference to those of a remoter ancestor, and amongst descendants of the same ancestor the nearest excludes the more remote.

2209. Samanodaks.—Failing all Gotraj Sapindas the inheritance falls to the Samanodaks, who are all agnates beyond the degree of Sapindas <sup>(1)</sup> i e., from the 7th to the 13th degree, 147 relations in number. The Mitakshara carries them even further so long as the pedigree can be proved. <sup>(2)</sup>

(1) The seven descendants of the propositus from the 7th to the 13th degree. (=7)

(2) The seven ascendants of the owner from the 7th to the 13th degree. (=7)

(3) The seven descendants from the 7th to the 13th degree in each of the 6 collateral lines of the owner. (=6×7=42)

(4) The 13 descendants in each of the collateral lines of the 7 ascendants who are up in the line from the 7th to the 13th degree from the owner. (=7×13=91) (=147.)

Tulsi (T) was the widow of G and the question was who were her next reversioners, whether N. O. R. & S. on the one side or J on the other. It was held that N. O. R. & S were in the 8th degree whereas J was in the 12th degree. As such they being nearer according to the rule of propinquity than J who was a descendant of A the great great grandfather of J, were entitled to succeed in preference to J. <sup>(4)</sup>

The order of succession amongst Samanodaks is as follows :

2211. Failing all gotraja sapindas, the inheritance passes to what are called the samanodaks who are all agnates beyond the degree of sapinda.

"The order of succession" amongst the samanodaks, appears to be governed by two principles, namely:—

(1) The descendants of a nearer ancestor succeed in preference to those of a remoter ancestor.

(2) Amongst the descendants of the same ancestor the nearer excludes the more remote.

In the case of samanodaks it is not possible to apply the test of religious efficacy.

2218. Analogous Law.—The following texts support the section :—

Mitakshara :—On failure of gotraj the bandhus are heirs. Bandhus are of three kinds (i) those related to the person himself, to his father or to his mother as is declared by the following text "The sons of his own father's sister, the sons of his own mother's sister and the sons of his own maternal uncle, must be considered as his own cognate kindred. The sons of his father's paternal aunt, the sons of his father's maternal aunt and the sons of his father's maternal uncle, must be deemed his father's cognate kindred. The sons of his mother's paternal aunt, the sons of his mother's maternal aunt, and the sons of his mother's maternal uncles must be reckoned his mother's cognate kindred."

2. Here by reason of near affinity, the Atma Bandhus are his successors in the first instance ; on failure of them his Pitri Bandhus or if there be none, his Matri Bandhus. This must be understood to be in the order of succession here intended. (1)

Two questions arise in a case of Bandhu succession First. Is the claimant a Bandhu? and secondly if so, is he the nearest Bandhu. These two questions are not solved by any text in the Mitakshara, which contains a meagre reference to them.

2214. Bandhus.—With the exception of the daughter's son who succeeds by virtue of a special text (2) all other Bandhus take the last place in the order of succession, which as already remarked, first falls on the Gotraj's Sapindas, then on the Samanodaks and lastly on Bandhus who cannot inherit so long as there is a Sapinda or Samanodak in existence. (3) As such the Samanodak however, remote even in the 13th degree, will succeed in preference to the deceased's sister's son who is a bandhu. (4)

The term "Bandhu" has already been defined. A Bandhu is a cognate Sapinda, that is to say, one related through a female. They are, therefore, called Bhinna Gotra Sapindas. A person is a Bandhu if he can show that he is related to the deceased through a female and that he is his Sapinda. There must be at least one female between the propositus and the Bandhu and in the case of Bandhus ex parte paterna there cannot be more than two females between them. (5)

2215. The text divides Bandhus into three classes.

(1) Atma Bandhus.—comprising

- (1) Father's sister's son.
- (2) Mother's sister's son.
- (3) Mother's brother's son.

(2) Pitri Bandhus.—comprising

- (2) Father's mother's sister's son.
- (3) Father's mother's brother's son.

(3) Matri Bandhus.—comprising

- (1) Mother's father's sister's son.
- (2) Mother's mother's sister's son.
- (3) Mother's mother's brother's son.

In addition to the textual Bandhus—other relations are classed as Bandhus. Thus in Bombay the daughters of descendants and collaterals within seven degrees are bandhus (1) who come in after the Bandhus expressly named in the Mitakshara. (2) Such is the son's daughter (3) daughter's daughter (4) or a brother's (5) or a sister's daughter. (6)

In Madras the son's daughter (7) daughter's daughter (8) brother's daughter (9) father's sister (10) are bandhus. But a sister's daughter is not a bandhu in Madras (11) as she is in Bombay. Various reasons have been given in Bombay and Madras for letting in these relations. But the fact is that the woman's right had not developed when the Mitakshara was written and its subsequent acceptance by the courts as the last word in Hindu law has stereotyped the inequity which, however, justified in a patriarchal age, is wholly unsuitable to modern times.

But though the Bombay and the Madras courts have succeeded in letting in the female relations named, the courts in the other Mitakshara country strictly follow the text of the Mitakshara admitting none but those expressly mentioned therein as heirs. (12) As such even a sister is excluded because she is not expressly named. (13)

2216. Ground for Preference.—The first clause relates to affinity, this to propinquity. Having once established the Sapinda relationship as therein provided we have next to select out the nearest Sapinda, that is to say, the heir, between whom and the deceased there must be closest community of blood. Now how is this to be determined? The following text offers a solution:—

Mitakshara:—Here by reason of near affinity the Bandhus of the deceased himself are his successors in the first instance; on failure of them his father's Bandhus; or, if there be none, his mother's Bandhus. This must be understood to be the order of succession here intended. (1)

So far as this text goes it is conclusive. But the question still remains whether this order of precedence was limited only to the Bandhus named in the Mitakshara or applies equally to others not therein named. That it must apply to all is clear from the fact that it is now settled that the Mitakshara list is merely illustrative and not exhaustive from which it follows, and it has been so held that the same rule as to propinquity should be applied in testing the claim of all Bandhus. (2) At one time considerations of religious efficacy were held to determine the preference (3) but this is not the real test and as stated in the Vimitrodaya, "nearness of propinquity is alone the criterion of succession." (4)

2217. It was also at one time suggested that the enumerated bandhus in the Mitakshara or by Satatap must be given preference over others; but this view too has been negatived by the courts in which the contest lay between the sister's son (5) and the maternal uncle (6) against the mother's sister's son. "But the introduction of the maternal uncle and the sister's son into a list of Bandhus so as to effect a breach in the order of persons named is no reason for repudiating the notion of order amongst the persons inter se who have been named. (7)

2218. Even amongst Bandhus a ground for preference inter se is said to be found into the two sub-divisions into which they are grouped, viz (1) those related through the daughters of the family, and (2) those, related through the mother of the deceased. Of these the former are said to exclude the latter and among them preference is given to the descendants of the deceased. But this further classification is deprecated (8) and the better course held to be to prefer one who is nearer in degree to the common ancestor. (9)

2219. Another ground of preference equally unsupported by the texts is founded upon the fact "the general preference exhibited by the Mitakshara for the male over the female line . . . may legitimately be extended so as to prefer, all other considerations being equal, that claimant between whom and the stem there intervenes only one female link, is preferable to that claimant who is separated from the stem by two such links." (10) But this view has been dissented from elsewhere. (11)

It may then be stated that apart from these divergences the rule stated in the clause remains and is all that has received the consensus of approval.

2220. Nearer excludes the more remote.—This clause merely repeats the often quoted general rule of inheritance propounded ol. (3). by Manu and repeated by all commentators, viz. "To the nearest Sapinda the inheritance next belongs," (1) The question is how is the nearness of the Sapinda to the deceased to be determined. A large number of rules have been suggested (i) that nearness should be determined by religious efficacy (ii) that it should be determined by nearness in degree. As previously remarked the second test has now received the sanction of the Privy Council and must be the sole test. Now nearness in degree may arise (i) from the fact that he is so mentioned in the texts or (ii) because of his proximity to the common ancestor. The last clause deals with the textual proximity and the rules arising therefrom. This clause deals with natural proximity. But in some cases this proximity must, it is said, follow the analogy of the former. (2) Reasons have already been given why this view cannot be accepted.

2221. There then remains the sole test, viz., nearness of the line of the heir to the deceased in the case of Bandhus other than those enumerated in the Mitakshara who succeed in the order in which they are named. (3) But here again Bandhus connected through the father are preferred to those connected through the mother. (4) Other Bandhus obtain no fictitious priority by any analogy drawn therefrom but follow the rule of propinquity which places them in the following order:—

Classified order of heritable Bandhus:—

- (1) The son's daughter's son.
- (2) The son's son's daughter's son.
- (3) Sister's son (5) which includes a step sister's son. (6)

2222. Here certain writers place the great grand father's daughter's son (9) as an Atma Bandhu but the Mitakshara describes him as a Pitri Bandhu (9) and he is so held. (10) It follows that the great grand father's son's daughter's son, the great grand father's son's son's daughter's son, the great great grand father's daughter's son, and his son's daughter's son, and son's son's daughter's son cannot be classed as Atma Bandhus though they have been so classed by them.

2223 Atma Bandhus.—The Mitakshara defines the term “Atma Bandhu” as comprising the sons of a man's own father's sister, the sons of his own mother's sister and the sons of his own maternal uncle or in short, the sons of his father's sister or those of the sister or brother of the mother. These are held to be merely illustrative of the kind of relations intended. Even as illustrations, they are not those of the nearest of kin and the courts have supplemented that list by declaring many more relations as included in this class. They are mentioned below :

- (1) Sons of the daughters of the family :
- (1) Son's daughter's son.
- (2) Son's son's daughter's son.
- (3) Son's daughter.

A son's daughter is entitled to inherit her grandfather's estate as a bandhu (4) though she cannot inherit in preference to the father's sister's son because he is a bandhu expressly mentioned in the Mitakshara. (5)

2224. The sister's son has had a strenuous struggle to get admitted into the table of heirs. At first he was ruled out as no heir at all, (6) since he was not enumerated in the list of heritable bandhus in the Mitakshara which was taken to be exhaustive and this view was even concurred in by the Privy Council (7) but his claim was too strong to be ignored and it was first conceded almost simultaneously (8) by a Full Bench decision of the Calcutta High Court (9) and by the Privy Council in 1868 (10) and since then in several cases. (11) In Madras a sister's son's right to succeed is held superior to that of a sister. (12) He is a nearer heir than the father's uncle's daughter's son (13) as also the sister's daughter's son. (14) The sister's son includes a step sister's son. (15) A sister's son's son's son is no bandhu because he and the propositus are not mutually related as Sapindas, as the propositus is not connected with him either through his maternal grandfather's line or his father's maternal grandfather's line or his mother's maternal grandfather's line. <sup>(1)</sup>

2225. According to the view of the Madras High Court a bandhu with one female in the line is preferred to a bandhu with two females in the line. <sup>(2)</sup> This view has been dissented from in Allahabad <sup>(3)</sup> and Patna. <sup>(4)</sup> But if the Madras view be sound the daughter's son's son will take precedence over the daughter's daughter's son. In any view the daughter's son's son has precedence since he claims through the father while the daughter's daughter's son claims through the mother.

- (19) Grandfather's daughter's daughter's son <sup>(6)</sup>

According to Dr. Bhattacharya and Professor Sarvadhikari the following relations should come in next:—

- (1) Great grandfather's daughter's daughter's son.
- (2) Great grandfather's son's daughter's daughter's son.
- (3) Great great grandfather's daughter's daughter's daughter's son.
- (4) Great great grandfather's son's daughter's daughter's son.

But in view of the preference given to a maternal uncle of half blood over a paternal aunt <sup>(7)</sup> they cannot be classed amongst Atma Bandhus.

2226. Atma Bandhu Ex-parte Materna:—These are all sons of daughter's sons.

39. Mother's sister's son's son <sup>(8)</sup> The Patna High Court have in two cases given preference to a Matri Bandhu over a pitri bandhu because he was nearer in degree counting from the common ancestors in their respective lines, and also on the ground of religious merit, holding that when there is a contest between Bandhus other than the 9 Bandhus or between one of the former and one of the latter, the principle of numerical propinquity alone will determine the heritable right supplemented in case of doubt by the rule of religious efficacy and such other rules derived from the succession of agnates as may be appropriate. <sup>(9)</sup> In this view it has postponed the mother's sister's son's son to the maternal grandfather's daughter's son as being one degree nearer to the common ancestor though he is described as a matri bandhu in the Mitakshara and the former is an Atma Bandhu.<sup>(1)</sup> These decisions proceed upon the view that outside the specially named nine bandhus there is no justification for following the same gradation.

It was so decided by the majority of three judges of a Full Bench, the minority of two however being in favour of the tripartite distinction as applicable to all bandhus, whether out of the nine enumerated in the Mitakshara or those not so named.<sup>(2)</sup>

40. Mother's brother's daughter's son's son:—

Dr. Bhattacharya<sup>(3)</sup> and Professor Sarvadhikari<sup>(4)</sup> here place:—

- (1) Maternal great grandfather's daughter's son's son.
- (2) Maternal great grandfather's son's daughter's son's sons.
- (3) Maternal great great grandfather's son's daughter's son's sons.
- (4) Maternal great great grandfather's son's daughter's son's sons.

But as the maternal great grandfather's daughter's son is mentioned in the Mitakshara as Matri Bandhu it follows that his son and those following his son are not Atma bandhus.

- (41) Mother's sister's daughter's son.
- (42) Mother's brother's daughter's daughter's son.

These last two are Atma Bandhus ex parte materna to whom the deceased was Matri Bandhu. They are sons of daughter's sons.

Here the two learned authors above named place

- (1) the maternal great grandfather's daughter's daughter's son.
  - (2) the maternal grandfather's son's daughter's daughter's son.
  - (3) the maternal great great grandfather's daughter's daughter's son.
  - (4) the maternal great grandfather's son's daughter's daughter's son.
- but for the reason last noted they are not Atma Bandhus.

2227. Pitri Bandhus.—Next in the order of propinquity stand the Pitri bandhus, who are as follows:—

- (43.) Great grandfather's daughter's son<sup>(5)</sup>

2229. Analogous Law.—The special female heirs in Bombay are the CL (1) outcome of usage which has outgrown the law and the mode in which their rights have become recognized is set out in the cases which will now be examined.

In Bombay the wives of Gotraj Sapindas are themselves classed as such. But, as already remarked it is so by general acceptance and custom and is based upon no special text. As West, J., said: "The recognition of the widows of Gotraj Sapindas as themselves Gotraj Sapindas, however, slender the basis on which it originally rested so far as collaterals are concerned, has become a part of the customary law wherever the doctrines of the Mitakshara prevail, and the Courts must give effect to it accordingly. Whether indeed, the widow of a collateral should take before the son or grandson of the same man, may admit of question. The mother of the propositus takes before her son or grand son, and a like precedence is assigned to his grandmother and great grand mother; but the brother's wives on the other hand are not mentioned between brothers and their sons in Yajnavalkya's text, nor has Vijñāneshwar found a special place for them or for a descendant widow as he has for the daughter's son. Although, therefore, a woman, becoming a member of her husband's family, takes the benefit of a rule resembling that of the Roman law, yet as in that law the widow's right of inheritance was limited, and of late introduction..... Thus if the foundation of the rights of widows of Gotrajs under the Mitakshara is slender, under the Mayukh it may be almost shadowy. No widow of a collateral is expressly provided for; the only wife of an ascendant expressly admitted, is one for whom there is a special text." (1) In another case Telang, J., said: "When it is remembered that the widows of collaterals among the Gotrajs are not specially mentioned, even in these works like the Mitakshara, where collateral males like uncle's son etc are expressly named, it seems to be the fair interpretation to hold that a female Gotraj Sapinda in any one line cannot exclude any male properly belonging to that line." (2) Referring to these observations the Privy Council said: "It is obvious that the right of the widow must be mainly rested on the ground of positive acceptance and usage." (3) As such the same rule cannot be extended to the wives of Bandhus.

2230. Widows of predeceased Sapindas.—It has already been stated (1) 2. that widows of gotraj Sapindas are also classed in Bombay as Gotraj Sapindas with their husbands, and as such possess the right to collateral succession but not immediately after their husbands as was at one time supposed (1) but after all the male gotrajs are exhausted by any males existing in that line, within the limits to which the Gotraj relationship extends. (2) The word "line" here means the same as gotra or continuation of the line of ascent or descent.

For example, widows of the males in the paternal grandfather's line come after males who are heirs in the same line and similarly those in the paternal grand father's line and the paternal great grandfather's line. The males are exhausted before the females come in. (3) Now since the line of heritable sapindas includes descendants up to the 6th degree it follows that widows in any line will take in default of the males in that particular line to which their husband belong. In this view the paternal uncle's grandson is preferable to the paternal uncle's widow, since both are in the same line and male Gotrajs are preferable to females. (4) In dealing with the line of Gotraj Sapindaship the descendants must be exhausted at each step of the ascent, before proceeding higher to bring other heirs into the competition. (5) In this view a brother's widow is entitled to succeed in preference to the grandson of the paternal grand uncle of the propositus. (6)

(3) (1) Sister. 2231. The sister is an heir by virtue of the following text :—

Mayukh:—In default of her (the paternal grandmother) comes the sister; for says Manu (7) " (The wealth of the deceased) goes to whoever is next amongst Sapindas and the rest." Similarly Brihaspati "Where a childless man leaves several Sakulyas and Bandhavas whoever of them is the nearest takes the wealth (of the deceased)" Being begotten in his brother's gotra she possesses the qualifications of a Gotraj. The community of Gotra (does) indeed not exist in the case of a sister. But the quality of being a Sagotra is not mentioned here as being a condition of (the right of) taking the wealth (as heritage). (8)

On the strength of this text it was held by the Privy Council in a case decided in 1863 that sisters succeed to the estate of their deceased brother next in order of inheritance after the paternal grandmother both in accordance with the written law and usage prevalent in Bombay (9) unless there is evidence of any usage to the contrary. (10) Like the widow of the propositus, his mother and his paternal grandmother are persona designata to whom a particular position is assigned (11) all of whom, however take after the male Gotraj Sapindas. The sister comes in as a Gotraj Sapinda and as such is postponed to the brother's son by virtue of the express text (12) but she takes before a half brother. (13) On the other hand, under the Mitakshara even the son of a half brother is entitled to preference over her. (1)

Under the Mayukh she has precedence over her brother's step mother or his paternal first cousin or his son (2) the brother's widow (3) and uncle's widow (4) and his other remote male relatives. (5) The fact that another heir has intervened between the brother and the sister does not exclude the right of the sister. (6)

An unendowed sister has no prior right of succession over the endowed sister such as an unendowed daughter has over an endowed daughter, a distinction based on express texts which cannot be extended by analogy to sisters. (7) Sisters take equally (8) but in severalty and not as joint tenants. (9)

step mother (11) paternal uncle and a paternal uncle's widow (12) or a paternal uncle's son. (13)

"Now this court has held (14) that a step mother succeeds to the property of her step son in preference to the step son's paternal uncle's son, because the latter represents a remoter line of succession. If the step mother is nearer in the line than those in the line of the parental uncle, the half sister who is nearer than the step-mother must exclude those in the latter line." (15)

still the courts have liberally construed the texts and let in certain female relations holding "that any relative who is also a cognate may be treated as coming within the definition of Bhinna Gotraj Sapindas and that the term Sapindas used in Chapter II Sec. VI of the Mitakshara includes females." (1) It will be seen that while the courts in Bombay and Madras both recognize the right of certain female relations to inheritance, each gives a different reason in support of its view. In Bombay females are admitted because they are held to pass into their husband's Gotra upon marriage and with them are entitled to be classed as Gotraj Sapindas, while in Madras the term Sapinda is construed regardless of sex, though it is conceded that female Bandhus take after all male Bandhus, a female Bandhu nearer in degree being excluded by a male bandhu more distantly connected. (2) This view is supported by the following reasoning. The Mitakshara designates nine heritable bandhus. The Privy Council have held that list to be merely illustrative and not exhaustive from which it follows that in regard to Bandhus the Mitakshara did not limit the right of inheritance to certain prescribed relationships of that nature; but since it lays down a definite order of succession prescribed by law for the several classes it follows "that all relatives, however remote, must be exhausted before the estate can fall to persons who have no connection with the family." (3) This made the way for all females easy and it was made easier by a judgment of Turner C. J., who passed the whole case law in review and disposed of the implied textual exclusion of females in the following words. "It may, we think, be admitted—and herein is the reason why we consider it unnecessary to pronounce definitely on the sister's claim that Vijnaneshwar recognized the texts excluding females so far as to give priority to males, and he indicates with sufficient clearness the rules which are to be observed in ascertaining the order of succession; but his work does not profess to be a code but a commentary or law already accepted and which he assumes to be generally known. There is therefore much force in the observation of Mr. Justice Holloway that the rule of law ought not to be derived from the positive words of such a commentator, much less from his omissions." (4) The Privy Council may perhaps condemn this process of reasoning (§ 243) but it is now too late to exclude the female heirs who have since 1875 been so recognized. As observed by Muthusamy Ayyar, J., "The course of decisions from that date proceeds on the principle that consanguinity may be recognized as the basis of title to succession in the absence of preferential male heirs." (5)

• On this principle the following female relations have been held to be heirs:—

2241. Sister.—To support the claim of the sister to inherit, the commentators Balambhatt and Nand Pandit read the term "brothers" in the text (6) as including sisters but this interpretation is discredited by the courts (7) as also other texts supporting her right "to share with uterine brothers."<sup>(1)</sup> The sister's claim was consequently rejected in several earlier cases;<sup>(2)</sup> and in 1871 Holloway, J., was constrained to admit that a sister was not in the line of heirs though he condemned her exclusion as unsupported by the texts. (3) Four years later in 1875 her claim was admitted by the same Court in a judgment (4) from which a passage has already been quoted in the preceding paragraph.

The sister being a female Bandhu, is postponed to her son who is a male bandhu. (5)

2242 Half Sister.—The half sister is now equally in the line of heirs though she too must abide her chance till all the male bandhus have passed out of the line. (6)

2243. Son's daughter.—The son's daughter is entitled to inherit to her grandfather as a bandhu. (7)

2244. Daughter's daughter.—The daughter's daughter has been allowed to come in on the ground of her consanguinity which is recognized as the basis of title to succession in the absence of preferential male heirs. (8) It will also probably let in the sister's daughter, though they have been held not to be bandhus. (9) But as mere relatives they have a place in the line of heirs before the property escheats to the crown. (10)

2245. Brother's daughter.—On the same principle a brother's daughter would exclude the adopted son of the maternal uncle.

2247. Preceptor, Pupil and fellow student.—The following texts support these heirs :—

Apastamb :—If there be no male issue the nearest kinsman inherits: or in default of kindred, the preceptor: or failing him the disciple. (15)

Mitakshara :—If there be no pupil, the fellow student is the successor. He who received his investiture or instruction in reading or in the knowledge of the sense of scripture from the same preceptor, is a fellow student (16)

2249. The Crown.—The Crown is regarded as the ultima hæres in all systems and the Mitakshara designates it as the last heir, except of a Brahmin whose property shall never be taken by the king <sup>(1)</sup>. "On failure of heirs the wealth of a Brahmin must be given to a Brahmin." <sup>(2)</sup>

2250. The Mitakshara declares with some emphasis that the property of a Brahmin shall not be taken by the king and that "if there be no heir of a Brahmin's wealth, on his demise, it must be given to a Brahmin. Otherwise the king is taunted with sin." <sup>(3)</sup> The effect of this clause had to be considered in the case of a zemindari of which the last male holder a Brahmin had died, leaving a widow, who took a widow's estate, and upon her death there was no heir of the husband to inherit the zemindari. It was contended that the estate of a Brahmin did not escheat to the Crown and the Mitakshara was cited in support of the contention but the Privy Council held that his property equally escheated to the crown. In so holding they said: "It appears to their Lordships that the passage quoted by the Mitakshara from Narad in the very section which cites the prohibition of Manu shows what the law in its utmost strictness was. That passage is, 'If there be no heir of a Brahmin's wealth, on his demise it must be given to a Brahmin, otherwise the king is taunted with sin'. In other words, the king is to take the property but to take it subject to the duty, which he cannot neglect without sin, of disposing of it at his discretion amongst Brahmins of the kind contemplated by the preceding texts." <sup>(4)</sup> If this is so their Lordships held that the property vests in the king subject to a trust in favour of Brahmins."

2251. As the question in the case was between the Government claiming the property by escheat and an adverse claimant, their Lordships had not to consider the further question as to the nature of the trust, whether the duty imposed upon the king was one of imperfect obligation or a positive trust affecting the property in his hands or whether if a trust, it was or was not incapable of enforcement by reason of the uncertainty of its object; but they were inclined to the view that such a trust would fail for want of certainty of its object. <sup>(5)</sup> The crown by the general prerogative will take the property by escheat subject to any trusts or charges affecting it. <sup>(6)</sup> It is not however any more than the reversioner bound by any unauthorized alienations of the widow. <sup>(7)</sup> The right of an Istemrari Moukarari tenant in Bengal escheats to the crown and not to the zemindar on the ground that such tenure created an absolute interest in the tenant and reserved no such power to the zemindar. <sup>(8)</sup>

Where the crown claims by escheat against a person in possession, the burden lies on it to show that the last proprietor had died without heirs :

and the defendant in possession has the right to defend his possession on the ground of an existing jus tertii. (1)

All property in India belonging to the king vests in the Secretary of State for India in whom the escheated property will also vest as the King's representative. The Bengal and Madras Regulations make provision for the superintendence of escheated property. (2)

246. The heir of a hermit (Vanprasth) is a spiritual brother or associate in holiness, of an ascetic (Sanyasi or Yati) a virtuous pupil and that of a professed student (Brahmachari) his religious preceptor. In default of these heirs any one associated in holiness may inherit.

2252. Analogous Law.—

Yajnavalkya—The heirs of a hermit, of an ascetic and of a professed student are in their order, the preceptor, the virtuous pupil and the spiritual brother and associate in holiness. (3)

Mitakshara.—A spiritual brother is one who is engaged as a brotherly companion (having consented to become so). An associate in holiness is one appertaining to the same hermitage. Being a spiritual companion, and belonging to the same hermitage he is a spiritual brother associate in holiness.

4. The virtuous pupil is one who is assiduous in the study of theology, in retaining the holy science and in practising its ordinances. For a person whose conduct is bad, is unworthy of the inheritance, were he even the preceptor or (standing in) any other (venerable relation.)

5. The student (Brahmachari) must be a professed or perpetual one, for the mother and the rest of the natural heirs take the property of temporary students; and the preceptor is declared to be heir to a professed student as an exception (to the claim of the mother and the rest.)

6. Are not those who have entered into a religious profession unconcerned with heritable property (4)

8. The answer is a hermit may have property; for the text (of Yajnavalkya) expresses "The hermit may make a hoard of things sufficient for a day, a month, six months or a year and in the month of Aswin he should abandon (the residue of) what has been collected." (1) The ascetic too has clothes, books and other requisite articles; for a passage (of the veda) directs that "he should wear clothes to cover his privy parts" and a text (of law) prescribes, that "he should take the requisite for his austerities and his sandals." The professed student likewise has clothes to cover his body and he possesses also other effects.

9. It was therefore proper to explain the partition or inheritance of such property. (5)

2253. To begin with, this section only relates to inheritance to persons therein named. It cannot be extended by analogy to persons who affect to belong to a religious order, but follow secular occupations. Then again it applies only to the twice-born classes to whom these orders were open. It cannot apply to Gossain or a Bairagi because the order of Bairagis is not confined to members of the twice-born castes. (6) It is also pertinent to note that the sort of property for which the chapter prescribes rule of inheritance is the personal belongings of the ascetic such as his clothes and grain. The law cannot be diverted to apply to property acquired or possessed by quasi ascetics and hermits who do not belong to the class to whom the rules were intended to apply. As was observed in a case "To become a religious ascetic and exclude his heirs from succession to property subsequently acquired, he must bona fide retire from all worldly affairs and in fact become, as it were, dead to the world, leaving all the property then vested in him to his legal heirs who succeed to it at once." (1) In order to entitle the heir to succeed to the deceased he must show that the latter had completely and permanently renounced the world. Such is the case of the Mahant of a Math whose private effects would be subject to the ordinary law. (2) It must be confessed that the orders here provided for have long since ceased to exist and the rules can only apply by analogy and should be applied with caution.

2256. Brahmachari.—The professed religious student may himself be the preceptor of another to whose assets he will succeed. In one case such a case was supported on custom which was held proved. (7)

2257. Heirs of other Ascetics.—In another case, a religious mendicant died, leaving no heir except a pupil of the same spiritual teacher who was held entitled to succeed in accordance with the opinion of the Pandits who said "On the death of a religious mendicant, his spiritual teacher's pupil has the right of succession to his estates and there is no relationship between them; but the person who becomes a follower of the spiritual teacher is universally termed a religious brother by the fraternity of devotees. If such person attend on the deceased at the time of death, and performs his exequial rites, and if the spiritual teacher himself disclaim all right of succession, such religious brother is entitled to the inheritance. This doctrine is justified by universal usage." (8) In still another case of succession to a Bairagi his pupil was held to succeed in preference to his own brother whose fraternal relationship was held to have effect so long only as the proprietor continued in the order of a house-holder. (9) But his own gurus would succeed to the Shebaitship of a temple founded by them. (10)

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE DAYABHAG SUCCESSION.

247. In this chapter unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context Sapinda means a Sapinda as defined in S. 224 but not more than 3 degrees removed and includes cognate Sapindas within that limit.

248. “Sakulya” is a male agnate relation of the propositus in the Dayabhag law, four to six degrees remote from him.

Synopsis.

(1) Who is a Sakulya (3259).

(2) Texts on the subject (2258)

2258. Analogous Law.—The term “Sakulya” occurs in the following texts :—

Manu.—On failure of such kindred (i. e., Sapindas) the Sakulyas shall be the heir of the spiritual preceptor, or the pupil.<sup>(1)</sup>

Dayabhag (citing the last).—The distant kinsman (Sakulya) is one who shares a divided oblation, as the grandson's grandson or other descendant beyond three degrees reckoned from him, or the offspring of the grandfather's grandfather or other remoter ancestor.<sup>(2)</sup>

Shrikrishna (Referring to the last) The Samanodaka used to be taken to be included in the term Sakulya because they also have sprung from the same family. Although both classes of heirs (near Sakulyas and Samanodakas, or remote Sakulyas) are included in the same term, their order of succession is regulated by the degree of benefit conferred. This is the meaning.

The following texts of the Dayabhag define this term.

The paternal great-grandfather, and grandfather, the father and man himself, his brothers of the whole blood, his son by a woman of the same tribe, his son's son and his great-grandson, all these partaking of undivided oblations are pronounced sapindas. Those who share divided oblations are called Sakulyas. Male issue of the body being left, the property must go to them. On failure of Sapindas or near kindred, Sakulyas or remote kinsmen are heirs. “If there be none, the preceptor, the pupil or the priest takes the inheritance. In default of these the King has the estate.”<sup>(3)</sup>

If there be no such distant kindred the Samanodakas, kinsmen allied by a common libation of water must be admitted to inherit as being signified by the term Sakulya (conformably with Baudhayan's explanation of it) The distant kinsmen, that is the descendants of the paternal grandfather's grandfather or other remoter ancestor and such relatives, are denominated Samanodaks.<sup>(4)</sup>

2259. The term “Sakulya” literally means belonging to the same Kul' or family. Originally a Sakulya was one contradistinguished from a stranger. But later on the term underwent several changes. It has already been seen that the ancestor in the 4th, 5th and 6th degree was treated as a Sakulya but this term does not occur in the Mitakshara. The term is used in the Dayabhag to all persons who presented divided oblations to the deceased who received divided oblations from them, and who presented divided oblations (to common ancestors) in which the deceased had a right of participation.<sup>(5)</sup> This is not all. The descendants of those ancestors to whom the deceased presented divided oblations were also his Sakulyas because the last owner had also a right of participation in the pindas (undivided or divided) which these presented to common ancestors.<sup>(6)</sup>

(5) Ib. XI-VI.15.

Now Sakulyas are divided into those who are near and those remote. While the former can be ascertained with some certainty, it is not possible to exhaust the enumeration of the latter.

The subject will have to be further considered in the sequel.

Heritable property. 249. All property owned by a person whether joint or separate passes on his death by succession.

2260. Analogous Law.—It has been stated before (2068) that the Mitakshara recognizes two modes of succession according to the nature of the property. But the Dayabhag school recognizes no succession by survivorship, the only succession it recognizes is that by descent whether the property be co-parcenary or separate. Consequently when the owner dies issueless, his estate, whether comprising moveable or immoveable property, joint or separate, devolves upon his widow to the exclusion of her husband's co-parceners.<sup>(1)</sup> In other words in all cases succession is by descent and not by survivorship.

Principle governing succession. 250. The heirs of a deceased owner are in their order the following:—

- (1) Sapindas.
- (2) Sakulyas.
- (3) Samanodaks.
- (4) Bandhus other than those taking as Sapindas.
- (5) The preceptor.
- (6) A Pupil.
- (7) A Fellow student.
- (8) The King.

2261. Analogous Law.—The principle of this section was settled by the Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in which Mitter, J laid down the above as the heirs of the deceased owner subject to the Dayabhag law.<sup>(2)</sup> But though this is the net result of the law, the process of reasoning by which it is reached requires examination. Under the Mitakshara system propinquity is the governing rule of succession; but the Dayabhag law of succession is the religious-law and succession is mainly, though not solely<sup>(3)</sup> based upon the doctrine of spiritual benefit which the heir is supposed to confer upon the deceased. As was observed in a case: "Spiritual benefit, notwithstanding some authorities to the contrary is not always the guiding principle of inheritance under the Bengal school of law. The theory of spiritual benefit cannot apply to a good many cases of inheritance under the Dayabhag school of law. Spiritual efficacy as a principle guiding rules of succession must fail in the case of all female relations. The widow, the daughter, the mother, and the paternal grandmother are said to inherit under express texts. It was necessary in their cases to have recourse to a different principle, and that principle must have been affinity and affection, which had led the more ancient sages to say that they come in the line of heirs. Yajnavalkya's texts, as well as the texts of many sages could not be either easily avoided or reconciled with the theory of spiritual efficacy in all cases. In most cases, propinquity, spiritual efficacy and natural love and affection run in the same lines and no difficulty arises, but whenever they run in different lines, Jimut Vahan was compelled to ignore spiritual efficacy and have recourse to other principles or express texts" (1) This too was pointed out in an earlier case in which another Hindu Judge had said, "The succession of females according to Hindu law is quite exceptional and is not founded upon the ordinary rule, viz., that of spiritual benefit. It is true that in the case of the widow she confers some spiritual benefit, but if that were the sole test, she would have ranked much lower than what she does now. Daughters confer no benefit, but they succeed because their sons do. Thus it is evident that succession of females according to Hindus is not regular succession, and is not based upon the ordinary theory of spiritual benefit." (2)

But spiritual benefit is frequently a test and even a conditio sine qua non. It is, therefore, necessary to enquire what it means.

2262. Spiritual Benefit.—It has been pointed out before that Hindus with other ancient oriental races were given to ancestor worship (§ 5). It was believed that on death, man passed from the material world into a shadowy region where his earthly cravings continued. He needed food and drink and it was but natural that those who took his estate had to perform this office. This was regulated by the priests with elaborate ceremonies and of them one of the earliest prescribes them in the following texts:—

Apastamb :—(Abridged) 1-3. Formerly men and Gods lived together in this world. Then the Gods, as a reward for their sacrifices went to heaven, but men were left behind. Those men who perform sacrifices in the same manner as the gods did, dwell after death with the gods and Brahma in heaven. Now, seeing men left behind, Manu revealed this ceremony, which is designated by the word Shradh, and thus this rite has been revealed for the salvation of mankind. At that rite the manes (of one's father, grandfather, and great grandfather) are the deities to whom the sacrifice is offered. But the Brahmins who are fed are the sacrificial fire (the mouth of the gods).

22. That rite must be performed in the latter half of every month. Numerous and distinguished offspring, success in agriculture and trade, store of cattle, success in battle and the attainment of general prosperity are the rewards which the sacrificer obtains if he performs the ceremony at stated periods.

23-24. The substances (to be offered) at these (sacrifices) are sesamum, mash, rice, barley water, roots and fruit. But the satisfaction of the manes is greater, if food mixed with fat and if beef, buffaloes' meat, and the flesh of other tame and wild animals is offered to them. (3)

(3) 2. S. B. E. 188-140, last verse is incorrectly translated therein see Sarv. Inh. pp 49, 50.

This was the original shraddh; but it has since undergone a change. Manu's description of it is more elaborate :—

Manu III. 82.—Each day let him perform a Shraddh: with boiled rice and the like, or with water or with milk, roots, and fruit; for this he obtains favours from departed progenitors. (1)

207. The divine manes are always pleased with an oblation of empty glades, naturally clean, on the banks of rivers, and in solitary spots.

214. Having walked in order from north to south, and thrown into the fire all the ingredients of his oblation, let him sprinkle water on the ground with his right hand

215. From the remainder of the clarified butter having formed three balls of rice let him offer them, with fixed attention in the same manner as the water, his face being turned to the south.

216. Then having offered those balls after due ceremonies and with an attentive mind, to the manes of his father, his paternal grand-father and great grand father, let him wipe the same hand with the roots of Kus (grass), which he had before used, for the sake of his paternal ancestors, in the fourth, fifth and sixth degree who are the partakers of the rice and clarified butter thus wiped of

219. Whatever water remains in his ewer, let him carry back deliberately near the ball of rice, and, with fixed attention let him smelt those cakes, in order as they were offered.

220. If his father be alive let him offer the Shraddh to his ancestors in three higher degrees, or let him cause his own father to eat, as a brahman at the obsequies.

221. Should his father be dead, and his grand-father living, let him, in celebrating the name of his father, that is, in performing obsequies to him, celebrate also his paternal great grand-father.(2)

In course of time the Shraddh became sub-divided and it was possible to perform a Shraddh for an individual ancestor or as before for the benefit of all ancestors generally. The latter was known as Parvan or ancestral and the former as Ekodishit or individual (3) These two Shraddhs have in course of time acquired a legal significance.

A Parvan Shraddh is a shraddh with a double set of funeral balls; three balls are offered to the father, paternal grandfather, and great grandfather, and three to the maternal grandfather, his father, and his grandfather; and the crumbs of each set to the remoter ancestors, paternal and maternal. (4)

The performance of an obsequial shraddh postulates three degrees of kinship to the deceased: (1) those who receive the entire rice balls; (2) those who receive the lepa or scrapings or rather wipings from the hand; and lastly those (3) who have to be content merely with the libations of water. These facts determine the degree of relationship between the two. The Pindas are offered to the three immediate paternal ancestors that is, the father, grandfather and great grandfather, and the three immediate maternal ancestors, that is the maternal grandfather, the maternal great grandfather and the maternal great grandfather. He who offers a pinda and to whom a pinda is offered are the sapindas of each other.

Next to them in degree are those to whom the lepas or wipings are offered. He who offers the pinda lepa and he to whom it is offered is the Sakulya of each other.

Lastly there are those to whom is offered libations of water and he who offers and he to whom they are offered are Samanodaks of each other.

This is the first principle. But there still remains another. It is a principle of religious law that the deceased ancestor receives not merely the oblation offered to him since he also participates in the benefit of oblations which though not offered to him are yet offered to the paternal ancestors to whom he himself was bound to offer them while he was alive. This widens the circle of relationship beyond those directly receiving the oblation. (1) Now as to those who make these offerings Vishnu Puran describes them thus; "The persons who are competent to perform the obsequies of relations connected by the offerings of the cake are the son, grandson, great grandson, the brother, the descendants of a brother, or the posterity of one allied by funeral offerings. In the absence of all these, the ceremony may be instituted by those related by presentation of water only; or those connected by offerings of cakes or water to maternal ancestors. Should both families in the male line be extinct, the last obsequies may be performed by women, or the associates of the deceased in religious or social institutions, or by any one who becomes possessed of the property of a deceased kinsman." (2)

It is thus clear the performance of the obsequies was a duty first charged on the inheritance. In process of time by a curious inversion of reasoning, the two became to be regarded as cause and effect, and the performance of a Shradh being instead of a mere duty of the heir, became the cause of his succession.

2264. Relations competent to perform Shradh.—But whatever may be the nature of connection between the Shradh and succession, the crucial question was what relations were eligible to perform it.

Bhav Deo mentions the following relations as eligible to perform each kind of Shradh.

(1) Parvan.

- (1) Son.
- (2) Grandson.
- (3) Great grandson.
- (4) Daughter's son.

Raghuṇandan gives the same list except that the two differ on the competency of the maternal grandmother (No. 23) and the great grandson's widow to perform these sacred rites. Raghunandan denies the competency of the former, Bhavdeo of the latter.

2266. Sapindas.—The question still remains who are the sapindas. The whole doctrine of Sapinda is contained in the following passage of the Dayabhag.

Dayabhag—Since the father and certain other ancestors partake of three oblations as participating in the offering of obsequies and since the son and other descendants to the number of three present oblations to the deceased (or to be shared by his manes) and he who while living presents an oblation to an ancestor partakes when deceased of oblations presented to the same person, therefore such being the case, the middlemost of seven who while living offered food to the manes of ancestors, and when dead partook of offerings made to them became the object to which the oblations of his descendants were addressed in their life-time and shares with them when they are deceased the food which must be offered by the daughter's son (and other) descendants beyond the third degree. Hence those ancestors to whom he presented oblations, and those descendants who present oblations to him partake of an undivided offering in the form of (pinda) food at obsequies. Persons who partake of offerings are Sapindas. (2)

2268. The Sapindas may thus be divided into three classes:—

- (1) The ancestors of a person to whom he is bound to offer a pinda.
- (2) His descendants who on his death will similarly offer a pinda to him.
- (3) Other relations who are bound to offer a pinda to the ancestors to whom he is similarly bound to offer a pinda.
- (4) Five female designated relations, viz:
  - (1) The widow.
  - (2) The daughter.
  - (3) The mother.
  - (4) The father's mother's mother.
  - (5) The father's father's father's mother.

(3) Gooroo Gobind v. Anund Lal, 13 W. R. 49 (60) F. B.

2270. Those who fall into the 2nd class are his son, grandson and great grandson and his daughter's son, son's daughter's son and grandson's daughter's son, altogether 6 relations.

2271. The third class includes all collateral relations, who may be grouped as follows:—

Firstly.—The brother, brother's son, brother's son's son, paternal uncle, paternal uncle's son, paternal uncle's grandson, and paternal grand uncle's grandson, altogether 8 relations.

Of these the brother has to offer 3 pindas, one to each of the three paternal ancestors of the deceased who are also his paternal ancestors. The brother's son will however offer only 2 pindas, one to his grandfather, that is the father of the propositus and the other to his great grandfather that is P's grandfather. The uncle and the uncle's son will also offer 2 pindas one to each of the two paternal ancestors of P viz. G. F. and G. G. F who are equally their grandfather and great grandfather. The remaining relations offer only 1 pinda each, the brother's son's son to P's father (F) the uncle's son's son to grandfather (G. F.). In this case the paternal ancestors of P. are also the paternal ancestors of all the 9 relations.

Secondly.—Sister's son, father's sister's son, grandfather's sister's son, brother's daughter's son, brother's son's daughter's son, paternal uncle's daughter's son, paternal grand uncle's son's daughter's son, paternal grand-uncle's son's daughter's son-altogether 9 relations, shown in the next diagram.

2272. Here the uncle's son offers 3 pindas, one to each of the three paternal ancestors of the deceased, they being his own maternal ancestors. The father's sister's son, and the paternal uncle's daughter's son offer one pinda each to the two paternal ancestors of the deceased viz., his grandfather and great grandfather, they being his maternal ancestors. The brother's daughter's son offers 2 pindas one to the father and the other to the grandfather of the deceased, they being their maternal ancestors. The remaining five relations offer each 1 pinda to one or other of the three paternal ancestors of the deceased, that ancestor being their maternal ancestor. All these are bandhus ex-parte materna of the Mitakshara school. They are Sapindas of the Dayabhag school.

2273. Thirdly.—Maternal uncle, maternal uncle's son, maternal uncle's grandson, maternal grand uncle, maternal grand uncle's son, maternal great grand uncle, maternal great grand uncle's son, maternal great grand uncle's grandson-altogether 9 relations.

The maternal uncle offers 3 pindas one to each of three maternal ancestors of the deceased, they being his paternal ancestors. The maternal uncle's son, the maternal grand uncle and the maternal grand uncle's son offer each 2 pindas to two out of the three maternal ancestors of the deceased, these ancestors being their paternal ancestors. The remaining five relations offer one pinda each to one or other of the three maternal ancestors of the deceased, that ancestor being their paternal ancestor. This is a case where some or all of the maternal ancestors of the deceased are the paternal ancestors of the 9 relations mentioned above. These are the bandhus ex parte materna of the Mitakshara school.

2274. Fourthly.—Maternal aunt's son, maternal grandaunt's sons, and maternal great grandaunt's son, maternal uncle's daughter's son, maternal uncle's son's daughter's son, maternal granduncle's son's daughter's son, maternal great grand uncle's daughter's son, maternal great grand uncle's son's daughter's son-altogether 9 relations.

Out of these the maternal aunt's son offers 3 pindas, one to each of the three maternal ancestors of the deceased being also his maternal ancestors. The maternal grandaunt's son, the maternal uncle's daughter's son, and the maternal grand uncle's daughter's son offer each 2 pindas to 2 out of the 3 maternal ancestors of the deceased, those ancestors being also their maternal ancestors. The remaining 5 relations offer each one Pinda to one or other of the 3 maternal ancestors of the deceased, that ancestor being their maternal ancestor. These relations are also the bandhus ex parte materna of the Mitakshara school.

2275. Female Sapindas:—The five before mentioned female relations are sapindas being mentioned in the Dayabhag as the direct heirs. (1)

The total number of Sapindas are thus 53 of whom the Dayabhag enumerates only 42. Of these the 5 relations specified in the clause are females and no less than 10, who though males, are mentioned as taking through females i. e., 15 out of 42 enumerated heirs are themselves females or take directly through females.

(1) Dayabhag XI-1-II, IV; Gooroo Gobind v. Anand Lall, 18 W. R. 49 (52); F. B.

Now since such relations are classed as bandhus who take after all the agnatic kinsmen are exhausted, it follows that the Dayabhag gives precedence to bandhus by including them in the list of agnatic sapindas and as such so far as these relations are concerned the tables of succession of the two systems differ; otherwise they more or less agree though they approach the question from opposite stand points.

2276. Sakulyas.—After the Sapindas, the Sakulyas succeed. The term has been already defined in S. 224 as persons related to the deceased in an unbroken line of male descent in the 4th, 5th and 6th degree. This is a sub-division unknown to the Mitakshara which classes all agnatic relations up to the sixth degree as Sapindas.

The total number of Sakulyas is 33, as will be seen from the table of sapindas elsewhere given.

2277. Samanodaks.—Like the Sakulyas, the Samanodaks are also agnatic relations related to the deceased from the 7th to the 14th degree. This is also the Mitakshara conception of this term, with the slight difference not recognized by the Dayabhag that even relations beyond the 14th degree are deemed to be so related if the pedigree be clearly proved.

The Samanodaks number 147 as already stated.

251. The order of succession among Sapindas, Sakulyas and Samanodaks is governed by the following rules:—
 Order of Succession among Sapindas etc

(1) Except in the cases stated below, those who offer pindas to the deceased are preferred to those who offer them to any of his ancestors.

(2) And those who offer them to the deceased are preferred to those who accept them from the deceased.

(3) A person who offers pindas to a near ancestor is preferred to one offering pindas to an ancestor more remote, irrespective of the number of pindas offered by each of them.

(4) Those who offer oblations to both the paternal and maternal ancestors are preferred to those who only offer to the paternal ancestors.

(5) Those who are competent to offer pindas to the paternal ancestors of the propositus are preferred to those who are competent to offer them only to their maternal ancestors irrespective of the number of pindas offered.

(6) Agnatic Sapindas in any line are always preferred to the cognate Sapindas of the same line.

(7) Between an agnate Sapinda and a cognate Sapinda of equal degree of propinquity, the former is preferred to the latter even though he offers more pindas in which the deceased would participate.

(8) Subject to the above, those who offer a larger number of pindas of a particular description are preferred to those who offer a less number of pindas.

(9) And where the number of such pindas is equal, those that offer to nearer ancestors are preferred to those offering to more distant ones.

Exception to Clause (1):—Nothing contained in clause (1) affects the priority of the sons, grandsons and daughter's sons of the propositus.

2278. Analogous Law.—The rules regulating the order of succession though ostensibly based upon the doctrine of spiritual benefit do not ignore propinquity and in fact whenever they tend to divert succession from the natural line, other rules come in to check their course. Such are rules stated in clauses (2), and (5) which prefer males to females and nearer relations to more distant ones lineal to collateral and those directly related to those indirectly related to the propositus. As a matter of fact shorn of their religious mask, they result in designating the same heirs as the Mitakshara which fixed their order by a more rational process of reasoning.

All the clauses are drawn from the decided cases <sup>(1)</sup> and their operation will now be examined.

2279. Pindas to the deceased preferred.—The first caluse lays down a rule which simply means that a nearer relation is preferred to one more remote; since it is only the nearest relations

CI (1). that give such pindas. They are the son, grandson, and, great grandson of the deceased, his widow, daughter and daughter's son who all offer pindas to the deceased and are preferred to the father and the rest. But the son's daughter's son and the grandson's daughter's son are exceptions to this rule, being allotted a place amongst this class though they offer no pinda to the deceased.

2280. Another rule arising out of the last is that those who offer pindas to the deceased are preferred to those who accept them

CI (2). from the deceased. Therefore, the son, grandson and great grandson who offer oblations to the deceased are preferred to the father, grandfather and great grandfather who receive them from the deceased, the former succeeding before the latter. As in the Mitakshara, the son, grandson and great grandson follow the rule of representation and all inherit as a single heir, this being justified on the spiritual theory that their offerings have an equal spiritual value.

2281. As a part of the same rule and indeed, as a necessary corollary thereof, is the rule stated in this clause that he who offers

CI (3). oblations to the father of the deceased is superior to one who offers such oblations only to the grandfather and great grand father of the deceased.

So in a case the family tree was as follows :—

On P's death the contest lay between J who was his brother's son's son's daughter's son and his uncle's daughter's son G and the Court upheld J's claim holding that he is scarcely to be distinguished from the brother's daughter's son included in the Daya Krma in the list of heirs and on the ground that he offered oblations only to his (P's) grandfather and great grandfather. (1) Even on the ground of propinquity J who is related to P through his father would be preferred to G who is related to him through his grand father.

2282. Then again, those who offer oblations to both the paternal and maternal ancestors are superior to those who offer only

CI (4). to the paternal ancestors. As such, a brother of the whole blood who presents six oblations to the ancestors of the deceased, three on the father's side and three on the mother's side, is preferred to a half brother who presents only three oblations to the common father (2) and not likewise to the common maternal ancestors of the deceased since his mother and the mother of the deceased were different persons.

The Dayabhag moreover expressly declares that the whole brother succeeds before the half brother.(3) But when there has been a separation, a half brother who becomes re-united acquires the rank of a full brother as in the line of succession which proves that the theory of spiritual benefit placed by Jimut Vahan is regulating the order of succession is not always an infallible guide and at times looks like placing the cart before the horse when he subordinates natural affinity to the so called religious efficacy.

2283. Preference of Agnates.—The preference of agnates over cognates

CL. (5) characteristic of the Mitakshara system extends even to the Dayabhag law. And the grounds for their preference are stated in clauses (3) and (4) drawn from the case in which Petharam, C. J., and Ghose, J., stated the rules as follows: "Between an agnate sapinda and a cognate sapinda of equal degree of propinquity, the former is preferred to the latter, although the latter is the giver of a larger number of cakes in which the deceased would participate than the former and also by the fact that agnate sapindas in any line are always preferred to the cognate Sapindas of the same line. For instance, the father's son's son (i. e., a brother's son) of the deceased owner offers three pindas, one to his own father and the other two to the grandfather and great grandfather respectively of the deceased and which two pindas only the latter participates. The father's daughter's son (i. e., a sister's son) offers three pindas, viz., to the father, grandfather and great grandfather of the deceased, and in all which pindas the latter participates. And yet the brother's son is preferential heir to the sister's son. Then again, as between the father's great grandson (brother's grandson) and father's daughter's son (sister's son) the former is the preferential heir although he is more removed from the father of the deceased, and offers only one pinda (i. e., to the father) in which the deceased participates, whereas the father's daughter's son offers a larger number of pindas in which the deceased participates." (1)

2284. Paternal preferred to maternal Sapindas.—Then again the

CL. (6). relations who offer pindas to the paternal ancestors to the deceased are preferred to those who offer them only of his maternal ancestors, irrespective of the number of pindas offered, because those who offered to the paternal ancestors are of superior religious efficacy in comparison with the latter. This is supported in the Dayabhag as follows:—"Now the Sapindas on the paternal line offer oblations to the paternal ancestors which the deceased was bound to offer and in which he participates, and the Sapindas in the maternal line offer oblations to the maternal ancestors which the deceased was bound to offer, but in which he does not participate; so that, while they both confer spiritual benefit on the deceased, the former benefit him doubly by enabling him to participate in the oblations offered by them and by discharging a duty that was incumbent on him of offering oblations to certain ancestors, and the latter benefit him only in one way, namely by offering certain oblations which he was bound to offer; and therefore, while both are entitled to inherit his estate, the latter succeed only on failure of the former". (2)

2285. So in a competition between the deceased's paternal grandfather's

CL. (7) great grandsons and his brother's daughter's sons the former were held entitled to succeed in preference to the latter because they offered an oblation to his grandfather and their great grandfather in which the deceased participated, whereas the latter offered oblations to them as their maternal ancestors, although they

(1) Huri Das v. Bama Churn, 15 C. 780 (791).

(2) Dayabhag XI-VI-18, 20; Brajatal Jiban Krishna, 26 C. 385 (391).

offered two oblations to the only one offered by the former.<sup>(1)</sup> For the same reason the father's brother's daughter's son<sup>(2)</sup> and the great grandfather's daughter's son's daughter's son<sup>(3)</sup> are preferred to the mother's brother's son, even though the latter is specifically mentioned in the Dayabhag as an heir, and the former is not. On the same principle, the grand uncle's daughter's son would succeed in preference to maternal uncle.<sup>(4)</sup>

2286. Heir fixed by the number of pindas offered.—The rule that he who offers more pindas of the same description must be preferred to one who offers a less number of cakes of the same description which the deceased received or in which he participates, is subject to the preceding rules under which it has been seen that a person who offers one oblation to the father of the deceased is preferred to another who offers two oblations to the grandfather and great grandfather.<sup>(5)</sup> But subject to the other rules Mitter, J., stated the two rules as follows:—"Those who offer a larger number of cakes of a particular description are invariably preferred to those who offer a less number of cakes of the same description and where the number of such cakes is equal, those that are offered to nearer ancestors are always preferred to those offered to more distant ones."<sup>(6)</sup> This is another way of securing propinquity. Under the rule the brother comes before the uncle because the former offers three oblations to the paternal ancestors of the propositus, while the latter offers only two. The pindas offered by the brothers are greater in number and since the brother offers oblations to the father of the deceased while the uncle offers to his grandfather, he is preferable also under rule 3. The brother's son and the paternal uncle's son each offers to the father and grandfather of the deceased besides offering an oblation to his own father; while the other offers to the grandfather and great grandfather of the deceased in addition to offering to his own father. Hence though the number of pindas is the same in the two cases, still since the pindas offered by the brother's son are to the nearer ancestors of the deceased the brother's son is preferable to the uncle's son.

2287. The exception to rule 1 in favour of a son's and a grandson's daughter and the son of a brother's and of a nephew's

Exception to rule 1 daughter who claim succession in the order of proximity before the maternal grandfather, is justified on the ground of their special merit. Jagannath argues: "It must not be objected that, were it so, the son of a granddaughter would have a prior title, even though the father be living inasmuch as he gives a funeral cake to the deceased himself. The oblations presented to the maternal grandfather and the rest are secondary because they must follow funeral cakes offered to paternal ancestors; the son of a granddaughter can have no claim, while the giver or sharer of a principal oblation exists. Nor should it be objected as a consequence that the son of the late proprietor's daughter or of his father's daughter, and so forth could have no title, if any kinsmen within the degree of Sapinda were living. The Mahabharat showing that a daughter's son procures advantage even by his birth alone, it appears that he does confer important benefit. Shri Krishna Tarkalankar concedes this opinion"<sup>(7)</sup>

- 2288. The son, the son's son and the son's son's son take as one heir by representation as in the case of the Mitakshara sons in accordance with the following text :
- 1 Son. (1)

Dayabhag—The rule of distribution among sons extends equally to them and to grands n in the male line. There is not here an order of succession following the order of proximity according to birth. For those three persons, the son grandson and great grandson, do not differ, in regard to the presenting of two oblations at solemn obsequies, one which it was incumbent on the ancestor to present, and the other which is to be tasted by his manes. (2)

In the Mitakshara country the illegitimate son of a Shudra can inherit. But not so in Bengal where an illegitimate son of no caste can inherit. The Dayabhag repeats the same texts in favour of the right of a Dasi putra to inherit, (3) but the courts have construed a dasiputra to mean the son by a female slave, which has become impossible since the abolition of the institution of slavery. The Dayabhag texts were examined by R. C. Mitter, J., (4) in a case in which it was held that it could not be broadly laid down that the illegitimate sons of a Shudra have a general right of inheritance to their father. All that could be said was that they may inherit in certain cases though they have a right to maintenance in all cases. (5) In later cases it was pointed out that the texts only warranted the claim of an illegitimate son begotten by a Shudra on a female slave, and that with the abolition of slavery the text had become obsolete. (6) The difference between the Mitakshara and the Dayabhag schools is thus not due to different texts but to the difference in construction, the Calcutta Court construing the term 'Dasi' literally as meaning a "slave" while the other courts construe it liberally as meaning a mistress. But since the text is the same the difference in construction does not appear to be justified and it is submitted that the narrow view taken by the Calcutta Court requires re-consideration.

- 2289. The widow obtains the estate as heir and not in view of maintenance:—
- (3) Widow (9)

Dayabhag : By this text relating to the order of succession the right of the widow to succeed in the first instance is declared. It must not be alleged that the mention of the widow is intended merely for the assertion of her right to wealth sufficient for the subsistence. For it would be irrational to assume different meanings of the same term used only once by interpreting the word wealth as signifying the whole estate in respect of brothers and the rest, and not the whole estate in respect of the wife. Therefore the widow's right must be affirmed to extend to the whole estate.

The widow takes as the heiress of her husband being entitled, to all his interest whether joint or separate, and as regards all property whether moveable or immoveable. (1) It is also well settled in Bengal that a widow obtaining by inheritance her husband's share in joint property is entitled to separate possession by partition with her coparceners unless there be a bar on equitable grounds. (2)

2290. The question whether the widow could be excluded from inheritance by custom was raised and decided against the widow in an old case decided in 1847 in which the widow's suit for possession was resisted on the ground of a peculiar family custom excluding childless widows from succession to the properties of her husband and father or grandfather as the case may be, and entitling her only to maintenance. (8)

It is clear that the widow in Bengal as well as elsewhere takes only a limited interest and that her interest is divested by the subsequent birth (4) or adoption of sons (S. 34.)

Where there are several widows they succeed jointly with the right of partition and survivorship inter se and in this respect their position is similar to the Mitakshara co-widows inheriting to their husband.

(5) Daughter 2291. "Daughters confer no benefit, but they succeed because their sons do." (5) This is in accordance with the following text:

Dayabhag.—2. It is the daughter's son, who is the giver of a funeral oblation, not his son nor the daughter's daughter: for the funeral oblation ceases with him.

3. Therefore, the doctrine should be respected which Dikshit maintains: namely that a daughter who is mother of male issue, or who is likely to become so, is competent to inherit; nor one, who is a widow, or is barren, or fails in bringing male issue as bearing none but daughters, or from some other cause.

2292. By the law of Bengal, the unmarried daughter is first entitled to inherit if there be no maiden daughter, then the daughter who has and the daughter who is likely to have male issue are together entitled to the succession. Daughters who are barren, or widows, without male issue or mothers of daughters only can, under no circumstances inherit. (6)

Of daughters, then, only the following succeed:—

- (1) Unmarried daughter (7)
- (2) Daughter with son or who is likely to have male issue. (8)

(2) Widows or

(3) Without male issue, as mothers only of daughters, are altogether excluded from inheritance. A childless widow is excluded (1) even though she may remarry.

2293. Under the Widow's Re-marriage Act it is competent to a widowed daughter to marry and beget sons after the death of her father (2) but if she re-married and begot a son before her father's death, then the estate would vest in her and would not be devested by the subsequent death of her son. (3) So it has been held that the daughter would inherit the estate if she was a childless widow when the succession opened provided she was of marriageable age in which case she must be deemed to be likely to become the mother of male issue, because she could re-marry under the Act. But the Dayabhag did not contemplate, remarriage of widows such as has been legalized by the Act and an ancient text cannot be construed in the light of subsequent legislation.

2294. Every married daughter is presumed to be likely to beget male children. If therefore she was married and was not past the child bearing age she would inherit to her father. It is then immaterial that she becomes a widow or is barren since an estate once vested cannot be devested by subsequent disability. (4)

Daughters like co-widows take a joint estate with the right of partition and survivorship. When once an estate vests in the two daughters, their right of survivorship which is a vested right cannot be devested by one of the daughters becoming widowed or childless. (5)

(6) Daughter's son. 2295. The daughter's son gives a funeral oblation to his maternal grandfather and is therefore his heir. (6)

Where testator left only two issues one a grandson through a predeceased daughter and another daughter, a childless widow, the former was held entitled to perform the religious ceremonies in preference to the daughter for the testator's spiritual benefit on the failure of the executor of the will to perform the same and to receive the income of the trust funds, though he could not appropriate the corpus. (7) The daughter's son's son is not an heir under the Dayabhag law though he is a bandhu under the Mitakahara. On the principle that those who offer *pinda*s directly to the deceased are preferred to those who make offerings in which the deceased merely participates, the next person to come in the list should be the son's daughter's son and the grandson's daughter's son and they have been assigned this place by Messrs Sarvadhikari and Ghose (8), while

Mr. Sarcar places them after the mother's sister's son <sup>(1)</sup> though the judicial decisions relegate them to a place below the paternal great grandfather's daughter's son. <sup>(2)</sup>

2293. This exhausts the heritable descendants of the deceased. After them come the ascendant sapindas, agnates having precedence over the cognates in the following order:

(7) The father.

2297. The father's right is equally supported by an express text:

Dayabhag.—If there be no daughter's son, the succession devolves on the father and not on the mother (before the father) nor at once on both parents. For that is contrary to Vishnu's text. "If there be none, it belongs to the father; if he be dead, it appertains to the mother." <sup>(8)</sup>

3. This is a result too of reasoning. The father's right of succession should be after the daughter's son and before the mother; for the father offering two oblations of food to other manes in which the deceased participates is inferior to the daughters' son who presents one oblation to the deceased and two to other manes in which the deceased participates <sup>(4)</sup>

The Mitakshara places the mother before the father and hence a long apologia in the Dayabhag for reversing the order of succession.

(8) The mother.

2298. The mother's claim is supported by the following text:

Dayabhag.—If the father be not living the succession devolves on the mother: for immediately after propounding the father's right to the estate, Vishnu's text declares "If he be dead, it appertains to the mother."

2. This too is reasonable: for her claim properly precedes that of the brothers and the rest; since it is necessary to make a grateful return to her, for benefits which she has personally conferred by rearing the child in her womb and nurturing him during his infancy and also because she confers benefits on him by the birth of other sons who may offer funeral oblations in which he will participate. <sup>(5)</sup>

10. (XI VI-3) Nor can it be pretended that the step mother, grandmother and great grandmother take their places at the funeral repast, in consequence of [ancestors being deified with] their wives, for the terms "mother" and (grandmother and great grandmother)&c (in such texts as the following) bear their original sense of his own natural mother "father's natural mother" and "grandfather's natural mother" and it is by these terms that they are described as taking their places at the final repast. Thus it is said, "A mother takes with her husband the funeral repast consisting of oblations to the manes: and the paternal grandmother with her husband and the paternal great grandmother with hers. But the introduction of stepmothers and the rest to a place at the periodical obsequies is expressly forbidden" <sup>(6)</sup>

It is thus clear that a step mother has no right of succession to her step son, and it has been so held. <sup>(7)</sup>

9. Brothers.

2299. The brother is expressly placed after the mother.

Dayabhag.—If the mother be dead, the property devolves on the brother; for Vishnu having declared that "If the father be dead, it appertains to the mother" proceeds to say "on failure of her, it goes to the brothers."

8. That too is reasonable; for the brother confers benefits on the deceased owner by offering three funeral oblations to his father and his other ancestors in which the deceased participates; and he occupies his place as presenting three oblations to the maternal grandfather and the rest, which the deceased was bound to offer; and he is therefore superior to the brother's son, who has not the same qualifications. But deriving his origin from the mother, the brother, though he does possess these qualifications, is inferior to the mother; and his succession, therefore, very properly takes effect after her. (1)

9. Here again a brother of the whole blood has the first title under the following text (§ 10) and even under the general rule for the brother's succession. The meaning is that the whole brother shall inherit in the first place but if there be none, then the half brothers; for he also is signified by the word brother, being issue of the same father.

10. The passage alluded to (§ 9) is as follows. A reunited brother shall keep the share of his reunited [co-heir] who is deceased or shall deliver it to [a son subsequently] born

15. Therefore the half brother who is again associated in co-parcenary shall not take the succession exclusively; but the whole brother [shares it] though not associated. Such is the meaning; and consequently the whole brother, who is not reunited in parcenary and the half brother who is associated should divide the succession. (2)

2300. Thus both by the text and on general principle, a brother of the whole blood is preferred to a brother of half blood because the former offers oblations both to the paternal and maternal ancestors of the deceased whereas the latter offers them only to the paternal ancestors, his maternal ancestors being different. (3) The preference of one over the other has nothing to do with the property whether it is divided or undivided. (4)

A separated full brother is equal to a joint half brother and they inherit in equal shares. (5)

2301. It has been said before that the daughter is an heir not because she confers any spiritual benefit but because her son is an heir. (6) But the same argument does not bring in the sister whose son is an heir though she herself is never the heir of her brother (7) though in a case decided in 1830 it was held that a sister enciente of a son may take the heritage in trust for her son to the exclusion of her paternal uncle's son. (8) In so holding it was said "The sister is the source of production of daughter's sons to the father and the medium of their relation. If at the death of her brother Gorachand, no son of Chandra Mala existed, still (since the right of the father's daughter's son could not otherwise be established) she was entitled to enter on the succession and hold until production of her male issue. This too was analogous to the succession of the daughter to the estate of the father, who died leaving no male issue or widow. The sister's son and not the sister was entitled to the property; for he offered oblations (incompetent to the sister) at periodical obsequies." (9) Similar view was taken in another case decided in 1830 in which the sister was held entitled to hold possession as long as there was hope of her bearing a son. (10) But this view was not acceded to in a later case (1) in which however, it was held that if the sister's son was conceived at the time the succession opened he will succeed, but his mother had no right.

10. Brother's Son. 2302. The right of the brother's son is provided by the following text :—

Dayabhag :—1. On failure of brothers, the brother's son is heir, for the text of Vishnu having declared "it goes to the brothers" proceeds, "After them it descends to the brother's sons."

2. Amongst these the succession devolves first on the son of a uterine or whole brother; but if there be none it passes to the son of the half brother. (2)

Jagannath :—The son of an uterine brother has the first claim because he confers benefit on the mother of the late proprietor; for it appears from a text cited by Jimut Vahan, Raghunandan and the rest that the father's natural mother also shares with her husband the funeral cake offered by a son's son; but those benefits cannot be conferred by the son of half brothers. however on failure of other nephews, the son of a half brother may inherit. (3)

2303. As in the case of the brother, so in the case of the brother's son, a joint nephew is preferred to one separate (4) and on the same principle, sons of brothers of the whole blood succeed before sons of brothers of the half blood, (5) and of two nephews of the whole blood a re-united nephew succeeds before the one separated and of the two nephews, one of the whole blood and the other of half blood, the latter though united succeeds equally with the former. (6) In other words mutatis mutandis the rules applicable to the brothers are equally applicable to the nephews, and it is so laid down in the Dayakram Sangrah :—

Dayakram Sangrah :—8. Among brother's sons associated and unassociated, all of the whole blood, the succession devolves on the associated brother's son.

4. In like manner, in the case of associated and unassociated brother's sons, all of the half blood, the succession devolves on the associated brother's son of the half blood.

5. But if the son of the whole brother were unassociated and the son of the half brother associated, then they both inherit together. (7)

11. Brother's son's son. 2304. The brother's grandson is preferred to the paternal uncle as explained in the following text :—

Dayabhag :—6. Accordingly (since superior benefits are conferred by such a successor) the brother's grandson excludes the paternal uncle; for he is a giver of oblations to the deceased owner's father who is the person principally considered.

7. But the brother's great grandson though a lineal descendant of the owner's father is excluded by the paternal uncle; for he is not a giver of oblations, since he is distant in the fifth degree. (8)

In a competition between grand nephews of the whole and half blood and those re-united and separate, the principle of preference is the same as is applicable to the brothers and nephews (2303).

Though a grand nephew is an heir, a grand niece (brother's son's daughter) is not an heir. (9)

A brother's son's son's son being in the fifth degree is a Sakulya and not a Sapinda. As such he cannot inherit in preference to a brother's daughter's son who is a sapinda. (1)

2305. The father's daughter's son is expressly named in Dayabhag as an heir in the following text :—

Dayabhag :—8. But on failure of heirs of the father down to the great grandson it must be understood that the succession devolves on the father's daughter's son (in preference to the uncle) in like manner as it descends to the owner's daughter's son (on failure of the male issue) in preference to the brother. (2)

The position of the sister's son in the line of heirs is both textually recognized and judicially acknowledged. (3) As in the case of sons of brothers no distinction is made in the case of sons of sisters of the whole blood and those of the half blood, both being equally entitled to succeed as provided in the following text :—

Dayakram Sangrah :— According to Acharya Chudamani the son of the proprietor's own sister, and the son of his half sister have an equal right of inheritance.

Neither a sister's daughter nor a sister's daughter's son is an heir. (4)

2315. Sakulyas.—In default of all Sapindas, whether Gotraj or Bandhus, the inheritance goes to the Sakulyas in accordance with the following texts.

Dayabhag :—14. Accordingly since the succession devolves on heirs down to the maternal uncle and the rest, in the order of oblations in which the deceased may participate, or which he was bound to offer, Manu considering that purport as sufficiently indicated by the two passages above cited, "To the nearest Sapinda the inheritance next belongs," proceeds thus "Then on failure of such kindred, the distant kinsmen shall be the heir," or the spiritual preceptor or the pupil.

15. The distant kinsman (Sakulya) is the descendant of the paternal grand-father's grand-father or other remote ancestor. Such relatives are denominated Samanodaks. Their order of succession is in the series as exhibited. On failure of such heirs down to the Samanodaks, the succession devolves on the spiritual preceptor, the pupil, etc (4)

Dayakram Sangrah:—22. The Sakulyas or remote kindred, are of two descriptions, 1st descending and 2nd, ascending.

28. The first includes the great grandson's son, and the rest down to the 8rd degree in the descending line. The second includes the great grand-father's father and other ancestors up to the 8rd degree in the ascending line.

24. Here the distant kinsmen in the descending line first obtain the inheritance, according to their respective order, since the deceased owner partakes of the remainder of the oblations which they present.

2319. Inheritance on reunion.—The rules of succession amongst re-united relations have already been stated in S. 152. There is no difference in this respect between the two schools, since even under the Dayabhag law "the reason for inheritance by a reunited co-parcener is not spiritual benefit, but a quasi-contractual relation and affection for each other." <sup>(3)</sup> Both the Smriti Chandrika <sup>(4)</sup> and the Virmitrodaya contains an exhaustive chapter on reunion <sup>(5)</sup> from which the following table of succession is drawn:—

CHAPTER XXIV.

WOMAN'S ESTATE.

2321. Topical Introduction :—Women's property is divisible into property over which she possesses the power of disposal at her discretion and that over which she possesses only a limited power of disposal. The former comprises property which is spoken of as her own peculium or Stridhan which will be the subject of another chapter, while the latter is the property which she acquires by inheritance or partition which is the subject of this chapter. It has been stated before that Hindu Law regards women as inherently incompetent to hold property. And such rights as are conceded to her bear the marks of the struggles which marked their course. To begin with, all Hindu females started as slaves in their husband's household. As such they had no rights of property. But in course of time they had to be conceded such rights by the force of usage. This has led to the adaptation of old texts to new conditions. The woman's rights at the present moment stand highest in Bombay and lowest in the orthodox Mitakshara country. Madras and Bengal take an intermediate place but the general rule that women take only a limited estate applies equally to all. But as their Lordships have pointed out, this does not mean that she is not the owner of her estate. All it means is that her power of alienation is limited.

2322. The conception of unqualified ownership with a limited power of alienation may not be consonant with the general law. But it is a necessary incident of a woman's estate. As such it has given rise to certain rights which the reversioner may enforce during the life-time of the female heir. What these rights are will be found set out in the sequel. This chapter deals with the rights of women over their property other than Stridhan.

The next chapter will deal with the rights of reversioners, while another chapter sets out women's rights over their stridhan and the law regulating its succession.

Restriction on woman's estate.

252. Except as otherwise provided, the rights of a woman in her property acquired by partition or inheritance, are limited as follows :—

(1) The estate is liable to be divested upon the subsequent birth or adoption of a son or upon her re-marriage but not for unchastity.

(2) She is not entitled to alienate the corpus except for legal necessity or benefit, as hereinafter provided but she is entitled to appropriate all its income and accumulations which she may dispose of at her discretion.

(3) On her death her estate devolves on the next heir of the last male owner.

Exception 1 :—Under the Mayukh law females who belong to the family of the propositus by birth take an absolute interest while those who come into it by marriage take only a limited estate.

Exception 2 :—A Jain widow has absolute power of disposal over the self-acquired property of her husband inherited by her.

Exception 3 .—Nothing in this section applies to an estate acquired by a woman by deed or devise which may confer on her an absolute estate.

2323. Analogous Law.—The position of women is summed up in the two texts one from the Veda and another from Katyayan which are cited by all later commentators as the last word on woman's capacity and has rights:—

Baudhayan:—The Veda declares "therefore women are considered to be destitute of strength and of a portion."

Katyayan :—Let the childless widow, preserving unsullied the bed of her lord and abiding with her venerable protector, enjoy with moderation the property until her death. After her death let the heirs take it. But she has not property therein to the extent of gift, mortgage or sale. (6)

Narad :—Women's business transactions are null and void, except in case of distress, especially the gift, pawning, or sale of a house or field. Women are not entitled to make a gift or sale; a woman can take only a life interest whilst she is living together with the rest of the family. Such transactions of women are valid where the husband has given her consent or, in default of the husband the son, or, in default of husband and son, the King (7).

Mitakshara :—(After briefly propounding the division of wealth left by the husband and wife), "But sons divide equally both the effects and the debts after the demise of their parents") The partition of a man's goods has been described at large. The author now intending to explain fully the distribution of a woman's property begins by setting forth the nature of it, "What was given to or received by her at the nuptial fire or presented to her on her husband's marriage to another wife, as also any other (1) separate acquisition is denominated a woman's property." (2).

Later texts emphasize her dependence and worthlessness except for the purpose of procreation. Her right of property has been of slow growth and the present law is as stated in the section.

2324. Women acquire a limited estate:—Women generally take a limited estate. It is immaterial whether she takes as widow (3) daughter (4) (except in Bombay) (5) mother, (6) or a grandmother (7) (except in Bombay) (8) it being immaterial whether the property is inherited from a male (9) or a female, (10) or whether the property is moveable or immoveable (11) partible or impartible (12)

(1) In original the word is आदि i.e. "or the like" so that the passage should more correctly read thus, "or received by her at the nuptial fire, or presented to her on her husband's marriage to another wife, or the like." So held in Chotay Lal v. Churnoo Lal 4 C. 744 (754) (P. C.)

ancestral or self-acquired, (1) or whether it is acquired by partition (2) or inheritance. As Lord Hobhouse put it, "It is not necessary now to state in any detail how impossible it is, whether with regard to the authority of other commentators or to other parts of the Mitakshara itself, to construe this passage (3) as conferring upon a woman taking by inheritance from a male a stridhan estate transmissible to her own heirs. The point is now completely covered by authority. In the case of Thakur Deybee v. Rai Baluk Ram (4) such an interest was claimed on behalf of a widow in her husband's immoveable property. In the case of Bhagwandeem Doobey v. Myna Baee (5) such an interest was claimed on behalf of a widow in her husband's moveable property. In the case of Chotailall v. Chunmoolall (6) such an interest was claimed on behalf of a daughter in her father's property. All these cases were governed by the Mitakshara law. And in all it was held that the woman took only a restricted interest, and that on her death the property devolved on the line of the last male owner." (7)

2325. Share on partition.—Then as regards partition the share obtained by a female on partition is presumed to be allotted to her in lieu of her right to maintenance and is therefore subject to the same limitation incident to a woman's estate. This had been the subject of some conflicting decisions of the Indian Courts, for, while in some cases (8) this view was followed, there were cases (9) in which the courts held the female to take an absolute estate. The question was examined and decided by the Privy Council who held the rule applicable to the estate acquired by inheritance equally applicable to partition. "Of course, the members of a joint family effecting a partition may agree that a portion of the property shall be transferred to the widow by way of absolute gift, as part of her stridhan so as to constitute a provision for her stridhan heirs, but in the absence of any such intention, their Lordships do not feel justified in putting property acquired by a widow on partition of joint estate, upon a footing different from that on which property coming to her by way of inheritance has been placed." (10)

2326. This was a Mitakshara case but the same rule applies equally to Bengal. (11) As Wilson, J. said, "The nature of her i.e., mother's right in the share when allotted was long a subject of controversy. Writers of high authority maintained that it vested in her absolutely and passed after her death to her heirs as stridhan. It is now settled in Bengal that this is not so but that on her death it goes back in some sense to her husband's family."

This branch of the law has now been settled by a long course of decisions which the Courts will not unsettle by any appeal to the original texts. <sup>(1)</sup>

2327. But though a woman takes a limited estate it is a proprietary estate in no way limited in interest <sup>(2)</sup> though it is limited in use. She does not hold in trust for her reversioners. <sup>(3)</sup> "Her right is of the nature of a right of property; her position is that of owner; her powers in that character are however, limited; but so long as she is alive no one has any vested interest in the succession" <sup>(4)</sup> The interest which her reversioners possess in her estate is contingent and a mere spes successionis which by relinquishment in her favour has not the effect of enlarging her estate by converting it into an absolute estate, <sup>(5)</sup> the reason being that her estate is limited because of her historical incompetence and not because of the necessity of safeguarding the rights of her reversioners. Consequently her estate is not enlarged by the fact that she has no reversioners, or that the crown does not claim her estate on her death by escheat. <sup>(6)</sup>

2328. The widow is not in the position of a manager because she represents no one and is in possession of an estate which is her own, whereas the manager of a joint family is merely a co-parcener in an estate in which others are equally interested and of whom he is a representative. Whatever therefore he does, he does with the assent express or implied of the body of co-parceners. In the widow's case the co-parceners are reduced to herself and the estate centres in her. She can do what the body of co-parceners can do, subject always to the condition that she acts fairly to the expectant heirs. <sup>(7)</sup> But all the same she does not hold her estate for them. The latter do not get the estate through her. <sup>(8)</sup>

2329. The whole estate for the time being vests in her; her reversioners having merely a contingent interest a mere spes successionis in her estate.

Cl. 1.

2330. Devesting of her estate.—The estate which a Hindu woman takes cannot be devested by any subsequent event. The only case in which it is liable to be devested is the subsequent birth or adoption of a son. Even in the latter case where the husband is competent to make a valid bequest of his property as where he is subject to the Dayabhag school or is otherwise competent to dispose of his property by will, he may provide against

But it was a case of compromise. In Kanuram v. Kashichandra, 14 C. W. N. 226 2 I. C. 660, the reversioner had purchased half the estate from the daughter and relinquished his right on the other moiety which was upheld inter partes But such arrangement cannot, it is submitted; enlarge the female heirs limited estate by converting it into her stridhan, the divesting of his widow's estate on adoption. As the Privy Council observed: "Under the Dayabhag, the testator has not only the power of authorizing his widow to adopt a son to him, and in case of the death of such adopted son, to make other adoptions in order to ensure the performance of those religious rites on which depend his salvation in after life, but he can attach to such authority a direction that her estate should not be interfered with or divested during her life, just as he can postpone the succession of his natural born son by interposing a life-estate." (1)

The estate of a Hindu widow is also divested on her re-marriage or retirement from the world, as by turning a bairagi, or the like (2) which amount to her civil death.

2331. Forfeiture of Estate on remarriage.—The rule that a woman forfeits her estate in consequence of her remarriage (3) applies a fortiori if she becomes a convert to another faith such as Mahomedanism and then remarries. (4) In the case of the widow her estate rests on the fiction that she is a surviving portion of her husband and as her remarriage destroys her identity with her husband she forfeits his estate. (5) The Hindu Widows Remarriage Act applies only to Hindus, but it is not exhaustive of the cases entailing forfeiture. The mere fact that she has become unchaste is however, not sufficient to divest her estate, as it is settled that an estate once vested in the widow cannot be divested by her subsequent unchastity, (6) for as observed by Wilson J., there is a very broad distinction between misconduct on the part of a widow as a widow, and her ceasing to be a widow. (7)

2332. Her alienation.—The right of female heirs is absolutely limited and not merely qualified by the existence of reversioners. Whether these do or do not exist the qualification remains because her estate is limited not by the rights of others but by the peculiar nature of her estate. If there are reversioners they may object because her act prejudices their right. But if she has left no heirs, and her estate escheats to the crown it has the same right. It was so held in the case of a Brahmin Zamindar on whose death the estate devolved upon his widow who having died without heirs, the estate escheated to the crown. (8) The widow had made certain alienations of the estate the propriety of which was disputed by the crown but the alienee contended that it was not open to the crown to contest the widow's alienation which none but her husband's heirs could control. The Madras court dismissed the suit of the crown holding that it had no right to question the alienation. In reversing this decree the Privy Council said: "It is clear that under the Hindu Law the widow, though she takes as heir, takes a special and qualified estate. Compared with any estate that passes under the English law by inheritance, it is an anomalous estate. It is a qualified proprietorship and it is only by the principles of Hindu Law, that the extent and nature of the qualifications can be determined. "It is admitted on all hands that if there be collateral heirs of the husband, the widow cannot of her own will alien the property except for special purposes."

"For religious or charitable purposes, or those which are supposed to conduce to the spiritual welfare of her husband, she has a larger power of disposition than that which she possesses for purely worldly purposes. To support an alienation for the last, she must show necessity. On the other hand it may be taken as established that an alienation by her which would not otherwise be legitimate may become so if made with the consent of her husband's kindred. But it surely is not the proposition that in the absence of collateral heirs to the husband, or on their failure, the fetter on the widow's power of alienation altogether drops. The exception in favour of alienation with consent may be due to a presumption of law that where that consent is given the purpose for which the alienation is made must be proper."<sup>(1)</sup> "Nor does it appear to their Lordships that the construction of Hindu law which is now contended for, can be put upon the principle of Cessante ratione cessat ipse-et-lex. It is not merely for the protection of the material interests of her husband's relations that the fetter on the widow's power is imposed. Numberless authorities from Manu downwards, may be cited to show that according to the principles of Hindu law, the state of every woman is one of tutelage; that they always require protection and are never fit for independence. Sir Thomas Strange<sup>(2)</sup> cites the authority of Manu for the proposition that if a woman have no other Controller or protector, the King should control or protect her. Again, all the authorities concur in showing that according to the principles of Hindu law the life of a widow is to be one of ascetic privation.<sup>(3)</sup> Hence probably it gave her a power of disposition for religious, which is denied to her for other purposes. These principles do not seem to be consistent with the doctrine that, on the failure of heirs, a widow becomes completely emancipated, perfectly uncontrolled in the disposal of her property, and free to squander her inherited wealth for the purposes of selfish enjoyment."<sup>(4)</sup>

2333. Restriction applies to moveables.—The restrictions placed upon a woman's estate apply equally whether the property she has inherited is moveable or immoveable. It has been so held by the Privy Council in a case in which they said. "The reasons for the restrictions which the Hindu law imposes on the Hindu widow's dominion over her inheritance from her husband whether founded on her natural dependance on others, her duty to lead an ascetic life, or on the impolicy of allowing the wealth of one family to pass to another are applicable to personal property invested so as to yield an income as they are to land. The more ancient texts importing the restrictions are general. It lies on those who assert that moveable property is not subject to the restriction, to establish the exception to the generality of the rule . . . Their Lordships therefore, have come to the conclusion that according to the law of the Benares school, notwithstanding the ambiguous passage in the Mitakshara, no part of the husband's estate, whether moveable or immoveable, to which a Hindu woman succeeds by her inheritance forms part of her stridhan or particular property; and that the text of Katyayan which is general in his terms and of which the authority is undoubted must be taken to determine first, that her power of disposition over both is limited to certain purposes; and secondly, that on her death both pass to the next heir of her husband.”<sup>(1)</sup> This case was decided in 1867 prior to which the courts in Bombay <sup>(2)</sup> and Madras had laid down the contrary. But in holding the contrary, their Lordships adverted to these cases and cited the Mayukh as laying down nothing different but on the other hand quoted a passage therefrom as supporting their view.<sup>(3)</sup>

This view has been held to apply to all women whether subject to the Mitakshara <sup>(4)</sup> or the Dayabhag law. <sup>(5)</sup>

2334. The question remains whether she has no larger power in the Mayukh country. The question was adverted to the Privy Council who said, “The result of the authorities seems to be that although according to the law of western school the widow may have a power of disposing of moveable property inherited from her husband which she has not under the law of Bengal, she is by the one law as by other restricted from alienating any immoveable property which she has so inherited and that on her death the immoveable property and the moveable, she has not otherwise disposed of it, pass to the next heirs of her husband. There is no trace of any distinction like that taken by the pandit between ancestral and acquired property. In some of the earlier cases cited the property was not acquired.”<sup>(6)</sup> The Privy Council thus left the question open and it was considered by a full bench who had to consider her disposing power by will which it negated<sup>(7)</sup> though it is was recognized that the trend of cases in the presidency was conflicting for while in some she was held to take an absolute interest in the moveables <sup>(8)</sup> there were cases in which she was held to possess no power to devise them by will. <sup>(9)</sup> The Full Bench case deciding against the validity of her testamentary alienation of moveables left the question of her alienation by a transfer inter vivos untouched and this was considered and decided against her by a Bench in 1907 who saw no distinction between a gift inter vivos and a gift by will,<sup>(10)</sup> adding : “Seeing the enormous wealth which Hindus in India hold in the form of moveable property, eg. Government paper, stocks and shares, which was unknown to the ancient text writers and commentators, it is perhaps as well that the law should be as we hold it is, and that their widows should not have an uncontrolled power of disposition in respect thereof after the death of their husbands. amongst and the general emancipation of their women, they may be led to call in aid the relief of the legislature."<sup>(1)</sup>

In this view a woman in Bombay is no exception to the general rule that women's estate in all inherited property whether moveable, or immoveable, partible or impartible, is qualified and limited.

In Sindh, however, which generally follows the view of the Bombay Court, a woman is still held to possess an unfettered power of disposal in such cases.<sup>(2)</sup>

2335. Mithila widow—Her customary rights.—Under the Mithila law a childless widow although she cannot alienate the immoveable property has an absolute right over the moveable property inherited from her husband and can alienate it in any manner she pleases and she has also an absolute power to dispose of the profits of the estate during her life-time.<sup>(3)</sup>

2336. Power over income and accumulations.—But though a Hindu heiress is not entitled to impair the corpus, she possesses absolute power over all accumulations and income of her inherited estate. This is so not because her estate is limited only to the personal enjoyment of the usufruct but because she has an estate vested in her for life and as such she is entitled to the absolute usufructuary enjoyment of the whole of such property.<sup>(4)</sup> She has the right to assign or otherwise dispose of accumulations. As Sir Lawrence Peel, C. J. observed in an old case: "The Hindu authorities say that a widow ought to live a chaste and retired life, and her duty may be to spend no more than is necessary for her support in a state of seclusion. But if instead of living strictly as she should, she lives freely and expensively, her disposition cannot be questioned. As to the corpus of her husband's property, she cannot alienate it; but the income of it during her life forms no part of the husband's estate. If she received and spent it all, no one could call her in question. So if she has money in hand she may dispose of it as she pleases. Money in hand and the accumulations are not the same thing. We do not decide on the question as to whether accumulations belong to the husband's representatives, we only decide that the promovent has a sufficient interest, in the proceedings."<sup>(5)</sup>

different if the accumulation had been made under the will of her husband in which case it would have devolved upon her as a part of the corpus. The case was decided on the ground that on her husband's death the estate vested in her and that all income therefrom became hers which though it passed to her with the estate when it was reduced to possession, was nevertheless the income of her estate and as such her own property.

2338. As observed in another case, : "The very question is whether, having regard to the widow's freedom in enjoying her husband's property and to her established right to alienate her own interest in it, she has not a kind of property the nature of which must remain undecided till her disposal of it or her death. It is impossible to read Mr. Justice Ainslie's forcible argument without feeling that it is difficult to specify the point of time at which the widow loses her control over the unexpended portion of her income from her husband's estate. If she may spend or give away the whole, may she not put by some ? If she saves one year or month, may she not spend those savings the next year or month ? If she may save and spend again, may she not place her savings so as to get to some income from them. And so on through all the steps of the sorites." (1) So in another case where a simple money decree obtained against the husband was sought to be realized from rents accruing after his death, the court said : "There can be no doubt as we conceive the law to be in this country, that this lady as the widow of a sonless and separated Hindu, became in virtue of her widow's estate entitled upon the death of her husband to the rents which might accrue from the immoveable property. These rents if already received by her and put into her pocket could not be treated in law as assets of her husband. They were her assets in virtue of her widow's estate. It can make no difference if the rents which accrued after her husband's death had not been actually put into her pocket. She was entitled to them, not as representative of her late husband, but in the right of of her widow's estate." (2)

2339. The test in such cases would seem to be that any accumulation of income made after the estate vested in the widow still remains its accumulated income over which the widow has full power of disposal. But if on the other hand the accumulation was made before the estate vested in her, then it would be treated as a part of the corpus. This distinction was ignored in a case (3) animadverted upon by the Privy Council. (4).

2340. Female owners in Bombay :—The rule that female heiresses take only a limited estate is subject to an exception in favour of certain female heiresses in Bombay where they are held to take an absolute estate, the rule being that all females who belong to a family by birth take an absolute estate ; (5) while those who belong to it by marriage take only a limited estate. Consequently a mother (6) a grandmother (7) and a widow of the propositus, <sup>(1)</sup> his daughter-in-law <sup>(2)</sup> and the wives of Gotraj Sapindas <sup>(3)</sup> take only a limited estate, whereas a daughter <sup>(4)</sup> a sister <sup>(5)</sup> a niece and grand niece and in fact any female relation born in the family of the propositus takes an absolute estate by inheritance to him, so as to become a fresh root of descent. This had been the long established rule in Bombay ascertained by the Court as far back as 1859 <sup>(6)</sup> and which the court will not now disturb on the principle of stare decisis. <sup>(7)</sup>

2341. Jain widow.—Another exception to the rule is afforded by the

Excep. (2) Jain custom which vests in a childless Jain widow an absolute right in her husband's separate property. <sup>(8)</sup> But otherwise she takes the ordinary limited estate. <sup>(9)</sup>

2342. Deed or devise excepted ;—The rule that a Hindu woman can

Excep. (3.) only inherit a limited estate is not inconsistent with her otherwise acquiring an absolute estate. Indeed the incompetence of a woman by reason of her sex is held to be limited only to an estate acquired by ordinary succession and not to one acquired by compromise, <sup>(10)</sup> gift, will or by adverse possession. So where on the death of her husband his widow sued her husband's co-parceners for possession of his estate whereupon the co-parceners compromised the suit by executing in her favour a deed of gift as a matter of favour conveying to her certain properties, it was held that, though by suit she could only have obtained a life-estate, by the compromise she had obtained a larger estate which the language of the deed in her favour was susceptible of conveying. <sup>(11)</sup> The question is one of construction. In this case the right of the widow was denied and the property was conveyed as a matter of favour which was held to distinguish cases in which the property was conveyed in settlement of her claim. <sup>(12)</sup> It has already been seen that it is open to a person to convey an absolute estate in favour of a female by gift or will though the presumption is that they take a limited estate. But the natural presumption may be displaced by the use of such apt expressions as suffice to convey a heritable estate. <sup>(13)</sup>

Synopsis.

- (1) Estate of Joint heiresses (2343). (3) Quasi-severalty in Dayabhaga and Mayukh (2343).
 (2) Joint tenancy in Mitakshara Law (2343).

2343. Analogous Law.—It has already been seen that one distinction between the Mitakshara and other schools is as to the interest taken by the heirs upon succession. Under the Mitakshara school which favours and strives for joint estates, female heirs on succession take as joint tenants<sup>(1)</sup> while those under the Mayukh<sup>(2)</sup> and the Dayabhag<sup>(3)</sup> take as tenants-in-common in quasi severalty. From the fact that the Mitakshara women inherit jointly it follows that the right of enjoyment and alienation must till partition, remain joint. Consequently one co-heiress cannot without the consent, of the other, convey the joint estate even for legal necessity.<sup>(4)</sup> As was observed by the Privy Council, "They are, therefore, in the strictest sense, co-parceners and between the undivided co-parceners there can be no alienation by one without the consent of the other."<sup>(5)</sup> But a co-heir may surrender her interest to the other heir in which case the latter would take as on survivorship.<sup>(6)</sup>

254. (1) Any accretion made by an heiress partakes of the nature of the estate to which it is added.

(2) The question whether any property is an accretion to the parent estate is one of intention to augment it by treating it as a part thereof.

2344. Analogous Law:—In dealing with the subject of accumulations it has been seen that the heiress is entitled to all accumulations from income made to her estate since the estate vested in her. These being in the nature of income are absolutely at her disposal. The subject of accumulations is allied to accretion and the reports teem with cases in which the question for decision was whether the property acquired by the widow is to be taken as incorporated into her heritage or is to be treated as her own. The whole question is one of intention. Did she intend to augment the estate or to benefit herself? It is settled that the heiress is entitled to appropriate and dispose of at her discretion the income from her estate, however large, from which it follows that whatever she may expend without let or hindrance she may also save or invest for her own use. This is also conceded. But then arises the question, suppose a widow comes into possession of the property of the husband, and receives the income, and does not spend it, but invests it in the purchase of other property, what is the presumption? Now the Hindu law presumes that a Hindu woman is incompetent to possess more than a limited estate—that she may possess an absolute estate is in the nature of an exception, and as regards the purchase out of the savings of her limited estate, law presumes that such purchase is impressed with the same incidents to which her main estate was subject. (4) But it is only a presumption which may be rebutted by evidence of intention showing that the purchaser intended to treat the acquisition as her own. This appears to be the trend of the leading cases on the subject, though at first blush, they do not all appear to be reconcilable. <sup>(1)</sup>

2345. In one case the widow had made such purchases from the profits of her estate. She gifted them to her daughter describing them as her self-acquired property. Her reversioners sued for a declaration that the gift conveyed nothing beyond the donor's limited estate but the suit was thrown out on the ground that the widow could treat the property as her own and the fact that she described it as her self-acquisition and conveyed it as such by a gift inter vivos was evidence that she did intend to treat as such. <sup>(2)</sup> In so holding Ainslie, J., said: "If a distinction is to be drawn between current income and accumulations, where is the line to be drawn? When does the surplus cease to be part of the current income. There is no rule requiring a widow to make up her accounts at stated intervals, and carry the unexpended balance to the credit of the husband's estate. How are we to say that up to 31st December she is free to spend the money in hand as she chooses, but on the 1st January it lapses like an unexpended assignment of public money at the close of the financial year. Who is to audit her accounts? If she is accountable to the heirs of her husband not only for the safe custody of his estate but for the expenditure of the income, then I can understand that she is not free to give away the moveable property purchased out of the surplus. I may say once for all that in speaking of surplus income I assume that it is a bonafide surplus, and that the expenditure of it will not involve any improper alienation of the corpus to meet charges which a widow is required to provide for; indeed, in such a case, I do not see how she is at liberty to give away, or squander any portion of the income, whether as cash or after it has been converted into property of any description."<sup>(3)</sup> This case was reversed on facts by the Privy Council who, however, indorsed the above enunciation of principle, adding: "It is impossible to read Mr. Justice Ainslie's forcible argument without feeling that it is difficult to specify the point of time at which the widow loses her control over the unexpended portion of her income from her husband's estate." <sup>(4)</sup> They then added that it was not possible to lay down any sharp definition of the line which separates accretions to the husband's estate from income held in suspense in the hands of the widow as to which she has not determined whether or not she will spend it. <sup>(5)</sup>

• 2346. Their Lordships then addressed themselves to the facts of the case and found the following facts decisive of the question against the widow: (i)—The purchases were of shares of land in which the husband was a share-holder to a large extent, and which showed that the purchases were intended to make the estate compact. (ii)—Though they were purchased a short time after his death in 1857 no attempt to alienate them was made till 1873 i. e., a period of 16 years. (iii)—The object of the alienation was not the need or the personal benefit of the widow, but a desire to change the succession and to give the inheritance to her own heir in preference to her husband's heirs. (iv)—Neither with reference to this object nor apparently in any other way, had the widow made any distinction between the original estate and the after purchases. "These are circumstances which in their Lordship's opinion, clearly establish accretion to the original estate and make the after purchases inalienable by the widow for any purpose which would not justify alienation of that original estate." (1)

2347. Another case in which the widow's power of absolute disposal was upheld by the same high tribunal arose on the following facts. The wife had inherited her husband's estate under his will, the accumulations of which amounting to Rs. 2,890,00 since her husband's death were made over to her in 1866 most of which she soon afterwards invested in Government paper which 20 years later she assigned to the Advocate-General and made a will. The question was whether she had the power to dispose of this sum absolutely by will. Her husband's heirs conceded that the question was one of intention but contended that her intention was clearly shown by her having invested it and thus capitalized it and that in any case the presumption was against accretion which had not been rebutted. The courts in India held against accretion and this view was affirmed by the Privy Council (2) who said; "The appellant's counsel contended that the savings of a Hindu widow must be presumed to have been made for the benefit of her husband's estate. Without examining the precise result of the decisions it is sufficient to say that in this case there is no room for any such presumption, for the corpus of the estate never came to the widow but was taken by Shamcharan Mullick under the will, and the income to which the widow succeeded was separated from it, and became and was dealt with as an entirely separate fund. There was no estate of her husband's in her hands for her to augment. She did nothing to indicate an intention to make the fund received, or the interest on it, part of her husband's estate which was in other hands, or to justify the inference that she wished it to revert to her husband's heirs. It was said she had placed it in investments of a permanent nature. Had she done so, it does not appear to their Lordships that this circumstance alone would have added the fund to the estate devolving on her husband's heirs. But the fact is that, having received the money in currency notes which yielded no return, and the keeping of which was attended with much risk, she at once placed it as any prudent person would do in securities, investing it in Government promissory notes yielding regular interest but which were negotiable instruments transmissible by mere indorsement. It is important also to observe that the other funds which she received from Shamcharan Mullick (the executor) were invested precisely in the same way and at the same time and that for purposes of investments therefore, the fund in dispute was not kept separate but was mingled with her general personal means and she seems to have used the interest and income of the whole indiscriminately for her maintenance and spent the greater part of it." (3) Reference was also made to the fact that she described the securities as her absolute property "for my own benefit and without any intention or desire to make the same or any part thereof, accumulations to the estate of Babu Nobo Kumar Mullick (her husband)." Upon these facts their Lordships concluded that the notes were her absolute property "and further that she never indicated any intention to make the same part of her husband's estate for the benefit of his heirs." 2348. What is the difference in principle between this case and the last, it may be asked? The difference is clear. Since while in the one case the corpus was in the hands of the widow the corpus was in the other case in the hands of the executor of which only the income was made over to the widow. Again the nature of the investment in the one case gave a clear indication of augmenting the estate whereas the investment in the other case was such as "any prudent person" would make of his savings. These two cases are therefore instructive in that they show what is an accretion and what is not.

2350. Evidence of accretion.—The question being then one of intention, evidence of such intention must be found in the circumstances of each case. Where, for instance, the widow constructed a house out of her savings upon land which she had inherited from her husband it is a clear indication of her intention to treat the house as an accretion to the land. (2) The same presumption might arise where the widow purchases a share of land of which she held a major portion as inherited from her husband which would indicate an intention that the acquisition was made with the view of improving her estate by making it more compact and convenient for management. (3) So where a howdah (seat on an elephant) which was originally a part of the estate of the husband had been sold to a stranger in execution of a money-decree against the estate, but the widow re-purchased it, the Court held the inference irresistible that she intended to treat it as a part of her husband's estate. (4) So where the widow makes no distinction between the original estate and the after purchase, the prima facie presumption is that it has been her intention to keep the estate one and entire and that the after purchases are an increment to the original estate.

2351. This was the view taken in a case in which the widow having made purchases out of the savings of her husband's estate had gifted the whole estate including the after purchases by a single deed "for the preservation of the Riasat and name of her husband, for the worship of the Thakur and for her husband's shradh." The court held that upon this deed of gift there was no doubt that the widow regarded herself as equally entitled to the two properties and in the same right as her husband's widow, which was only consistent with the after purchases being treated by her as accretions to the original estate. "The transaction appears to indicate that her intention was not to create separate estates, one to go in one way, and another in another, but to keep the whole as one entire property." (5) So there is a presumption that all unappropriated profits of the estate pass with the corpus to her reversioners. As Ainslie, J., said, "The fact that unappropriated profits do not pass as Stridhan is to be explained on the theory that when the widow has left money accumulated, it was her intention to add such money to the estate and to abstain from exercising her full rights over them." (1)

2352. But this presumption can only arise where the female takes by inheritance and not by devise. In the latter case as grantee of the rents and profits for life they vest in her absolutely as her own stridhan and on her death will go to her own heirs and not to the reversioner. (2)

2353. In one case the widow being in possession of her husband's estate sued for and obtained a decree for pre-emption whereupon the land so acquired was by reason of the mode of acquisition held to become an accretion to her inherited estate. (3) But the mere facts that her right of pre-emption arose by reason of her inheritance and the pre-emption money was paid out of the income of her inherited estate do not seem to be any evidence of her intention to treat her new acquisition as an accretion to the main estate. A case for accretion would, however, arise where the widow after her possession of her husband's estate for over fifty years suffers it to be sold in execution of a money decree and repurchases it herself out of the income of her husband's estate. Here it may be safely presumed that after the lapse of so long a period the debt could not have been the debt of her husband and the sale of the property was, therefore, a sale in a decree not binding on the estate and its repurchase was presumably intended to restore the status quo ante. (4)

There can be no question but that the enlargement of the widow's estate from an inferior proprietary tenure to a full proprietary tenure would not alter its incidents to the derogation of other persons interested in the reversion. (5)

The fact that a property though purchased by the widow was described as of the estate of her husband shows the intention to treat it as an accretion. (6)

2354. No accretion.—There can be no question of accretion where the heiress is in possession of no estate (7) nor where being in possession, she holds it otherwise than as an heiress. It is only when she owns it as such that any question of accumulation and accretion can arise. Even then since the question of accretion is one of intention, it follows that the heiress possesses the unfettered power of disposal over purchases made by her during her life-time. (8) She may in fact by her express declaration act or conduct, show that she does not intend to incorporate her acquisitions with her inherited estate. (9) It is only when her act or conduct is equivocal that any question of presumption or of intention can arise. If she disposes of her acquisition by a transfer inter vivos the question of intention is reduced to the question of construction of the deed, and if it is unambiguous her power cannot be questioned. (10)

2355. Properties purchased on the credit of the husband's estate do not necessarily become accretions though it is equitable that he who takes them must pay the charge. (11) So again where a female is granted for her life the rents and profits of an estate by will, they vest in her absolutely by way of assignment and whether they are collected or not, they pass on her death to the heirs of her stridhan.<sup>(1)</sup> Such case is distinguishable from a maintenance grant in which case all arrear is treated as a debt due to her which her stridhan heirs can recover and to whom consequently pass all properties purchased out of her grant.<sup>(2)</sup>

2356. Where the widow who had inherited her husband's house rebuilt it and sold it during her life-time it was held that it must be presumed that she rebuilt it out of her own money over which she had full control and the resale by her was evidence of her intention that she did not intend to treat it as an accretion to her inherited estate.<sup>(3)</sup>

After the title had vested in the widow her reversioner took wrongful possession of her estate. She sued him and obtained a decree for mesne profits which she assigned to another and then died. The assignee sued out execution against the reversioner in whom the estate became subsequently vested and he contested the widow's right to alien her decree for mesne profits so as to enure beyond her life-time; but the court held that the decree for profits was a decree for her income which she was competent to assign and that as there was no evidence that she had treated the decree as an accretion to the estate the assignee was entitled to recover.<sup>(4)</sup>

The fact that the purchase was made benami is clear indication of an intention to keep the purchases separate from the inherited estate.<sup>(5)</sup>

all additions made by a female to her limited estate out of its savings would prima facie be deemed to be accretions unless there is anything to prove the contrary. But on this point two views are possible and both have the support of cases. The one view is that since a limited estate is the rule and an absolute estate an exception, all acquisitions must be presumed to partake of the character of the limited estate till the contrary is shown.<sup>(6)</sup> The other view is that the woman's incompetence only applies to her inherited estate but has no reference to an estate acquired aliunde. Since a woman is not incompetent to acquire an absolute estate or title by deed, devise and adverse possession, there is no reason why any presumption should be made against her capacity to acquire an absolute estate out of savings over which she possesses the absolute power of disposal.<sup>(7)</sup>

2358. Referring to this question the Privy Council said: "Where a widow comes into possession of the property of the husband and receives the income and does not spend it but invests it in the purchase of other property, their Lordships think that prima facie it is the intention of the widow to keep the estate of the husband as an entire estate and that the property purchased would prima facie be intended to be accretions to the estate. There may be no doubt, circumstances which would show that the widow had no such intention, that she intended to appropriate the savings in another way."<sup>(8)</sup> This case is then an authority that a purchase out of savings is presumably an accretion. The contrary was contended by the appellant in another case which their Lordships did not concede. "It has been argued" they said "that, assuming the purchases to have been made by the widow out of the proceeds of her husband's estate, nevertheless they do not form an increment to that estate but belong to the widow absolutely and are at her absolute disposal, either by gift in her life-time or by will. It has been further argued that, even if the presumption be that such purchases are an increment to the husband's estate, it may be rebutted by clear proof of her intention to sever them from that estate and to treat them as made in her own right, whereupon she acquires the power to dispose of them and that such intention is proved in this case . . . In the present case their Lordships are of opinion that Khushal Kuar, who always maintained the validity of her son's adoption as heir to her deceased husband and treated him as entitled to succeed to her husband's property must be presumed to have intended to make her purchases an accretion to that property; nor do they see any evidence to rebut this presumption." (1)

2359. In another case the question of presumption being raised, the same high tribunal said: "The appellant's counsel contend that the savings of a Hindu widow must be presumed to have been made for the benefit of her husband's estate. Without examining the precise result of the decisions it is sufficient to say that in this case there is no room for any such presumption." (2)

2360. But there are cases on the other side of the line in one of which it was said: "The acquirer of property intends to retain dominion over it and in the case of a Hindu widow the presumption is none the less so when the fund with which the property is acquired is one which, though derived from her husband's property, was at her absolute disposal. In the case of property inherited from the husband it is not by reason of her intention but by reason of the limited nature of a widow's estate under the Hindu Law, that she has only a limited power of disposition. But her absolute power of disposition over the income derived from such limited estate being now fully recognized, it is only reasonable that in the absence of an indication of her intention to the contrary she must be presumed to retain the same control over the investment of such income. The mere fact that properties thus acquired by her are managed and enjoyed by her without any distinction along with properties inherited from her husband can in no way affect this presumption. She is the sole and separate owner of the two sets of properties so long as she enjoys the same, and is absolutely entitled to the income derived from both sets of properties." (3) The cogency of this reasoning was admitted by the Calcutta High Court who however felt constrained to hold that the subject was concluded the other way by authority. (4) It should be noted that the presumption will only arise when it is proved or admitted that the after acquisitions were made with the savings of the inherited estate. There is no presumption that anything in the possession of the widow belongs to her husband and he who claims the property as heir of the husband must show that any property so claimed by him belonged to him. And as a woman, has no power to make a gift except to relations when supported by religious necessity, it follows that she can have no power to make a will of her limited estate, which does not survive her death. (1) This is manifest. But it has been held that though she has an absolute power of disposal over her income in her life-time, (2) she cannot, except in Madras (8) dispose of it by will (4) even with the consent of her reversioners. - (3) She may grant leases and do other acts in the ordinary course of management.
- (4) She may transfer all or any portion of the estate for her life or until her estate is determined earlier, as by her re-marriage.

2363. Except as otherwise provided.—Under S. 90 of the Probate and Administration Act <sup>(1)</sup> an executor or administrator has, subject to the provisions of that section, power to dispose as he thinks fit, of all or any of the property for the time being vested in him under S. 4. As such the court may permit him to dispose of any such immoveable property by mortgage or sale and without such permission he may not lease it for a term exceeding five years. As a woman may be appointed an executor or administrator under the provisions of this Act, she is competent to make an absolute alienation under S. 90 irrespective of the existence of legal necessity. <sup>(2)</sup> As administratrix a Hindu female has the same power as any administrator under the law and the fact that her powers are circumscribed by her personal law does not stand in the way of her exercising her statutory powers.

2364. Entitled to possession.—Possession is the first right of ownership, and being an owner the heiress is entitled to possession.

G. (1).

In other words, she owns and possesses the estate. <sup>(3)</sup>

"Her absolute right to the fullest beneficial life-interest appears long to have been recognized. She takes as heir a proprietary estate in the land, absolutely for some purposes, although in some respects subject to special qualifications." <sup>(4)</sup> Her reversioners have no vested interest in her estate. All they have is a spes successionis. <sup>(5)</sup>

2365. Entitled to beneficial enjoyment.—From the fact that she is the owner of her estate it follows that she is entitled to its beneficial enjoyment and except in the case of spoliation and waste destructive of the corpus, she cannot be restrained if in the ordinary course of her enjoyment the property diminishes in value. The mere fact that her operation was novel does not show that it was an improper act destructive of the estate. She is entitled to make the most profitable use of her land, being entitled to it to her own advantage in the manner and for the purposes to which it is naturally best suited. She is entitled to lease all or any portion of the estate for her life and in permanency if justified by necessity. As such the widow had in one case leased out two of her villages in which a Railway company quarried stones and paid Rs. 5,000 as compensation to the lessees. The reversioners sued for this money on the ground that there had been a virtual conversion of a part of the corpus of the estate from land into money to which they were entitled as the ultimate owners of the estate. But the Court threw out their suit holding that the villages belonged not to them but to the widow who had the right to lease them out which she did and that the compensation paid to the widow's lessees was in the nature of profits from the lawful use of the land rather than the proceeds of the conversion of the landed heritage into money. <sup>(6)</sup>

2366. On the same principle there can be no doubt that the widow would be entitled to extract minerals, cut down timber or make such other reasonable use of the estate as is not in consistent with her beneficial enjoyment.

2367. Right to grant leases.—As such she has the right to grant leases Cl. (8). for such term as may be reasonable or prudent, and in any case for her own life. (1) The court has upheld a patni lease granted by her (2) but in each case the question is one of prudence or necessity
 (3) and general benefit. (4)

2368. A Hindu widow has not less power to grant leases than the manager of an infant-heir (5) and it will not be set aside if it is found to be for the benefit of the estate and one by which the reversioners are found to have been benefited. (6) The same principle applies alike to all qualified owners of property, whether a female heiress, a Mitakshara father or the manager of an infant or the Shebait of an idol. As the Privy Council observed: "Their Lordships in no degree depart from the principles laid down in the case of Hanoo-man Pershad Pandey v. Mt. Babooee Munraj Koonwaree (7) which has been so often cited. They have applied these principles in recent cases not only to the case of a manager for an infant, which was the case there, but to transactions on all fours with the present, namely, alienations by a widow and to transactions in which a father, in derogation of the rights of his son under the Mitakshara law has made an alienation of ancestral family estate." (8)

2369. Even a lease in excess of her powers is only voidable and not void; (9) that is to say, it is good till it is avoided. "If it was ipso facto void it could not, of course, be confirmed, and the acceptance of rent would be evidence only of the creation of a new tenancy. A Hindu widow is not a tenant for life, but is owner of her husband's property subject to certain restrictions on alienation and subject to its devolving upon her husband's heirs upon her death. But she may alienate it subject to certain conditions being complied with. Her alienation is not, therefore, absolutely void, but it is prima facie voidable at the election of the reversionary heir. He may think fit to affirm it, or he may at his pleasure treat it as a nullity without the intervention of any court, and he shows his election to do the latter by commencing an action to recover possession of the property. There is in fact, nothing for the court to set aside or cancel as a condition precedent to the right of action of the reversionary heir." (10)

2370. The article in the schedule to the Limitation Act applicable to such suit is Art. 141 (11) that is to say, the suit may be brought any time within 12 years of the death of the limited owner.

acquires a good title for the term of her life, unless her estate is forfeited earlier by her re-marriage, (1) or abandonment of the world. (2)

2372. Her Interest Attachable.— From the fact that she is entitled to transfer her estate for life it follows that what she may voluntarily do she may equally be coerced into doing by the process of law. 257. Where the Court of Wards or any other guardian is in possession of a woman's estate its power of alienation is equally subject to the provisions of S. 258.

2373. Analogous Law.—The Court of Wards or any other guardian of the female heir can only possess the power which she could exercise if she were competent to contract. As her powers of alienation are those stated in S. 258 her guardian possesses no greater power.

258. (1) A woman may alienate her estate so as to bind the reversioners for legal necessity or for its benefit.

(2) In particular, and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing principle such alienation may be made for any of the purposes or objects stated in the next following clauses :

(3) For performance of Shraddh of the last full owner and of his ancestors which he was bound to perform when living.

(4) For the performance of such other religious ceremonies as constitute a spiritual necessity of the last full owner provided that the immoveable property alienated is in every case reasonable and of moderate extent.

2374. Analogous Law.—The leading principle applicable to female heirs applies alike to all qualified owners, whether male or female, to the guardian of infant-heirs, the Shebait of an idol or temple, and to trustees generally. (1) The only difference between them is one of degree, but the cardinal principle is in each case identical. As such they are all entitled to alienate the corpus of the estate owned or managed by them for legal necessity or benefit. But these terms must necessarily vary with the nature and purpose of the obligation and of the property and the character of the control. For instance, an elephant may be a prime necessity to an idol but it would be voted a cumbrous luxury in the hands of a widow. Similarly the widow is justified in charging the estate for an act done in discharge of the religious and pious obligation to her deceased husband which would not be justified in any other relation. Subject to the necessary variations to be presently considered, her liability is generally on a par with those of other limited owners of property.

2375. Women's legal necessity.—The subject of legal necessity with reference to a woman's estate must not be understood as forming a class apart from the general law of necessity which justifies an alienation of his estate by a limited owner, the general principles of which have already been set out. (S. 96) The same principles equally govern all transactions by a female heiress, only modified by the peculiar religious obligations which Hindu Law casts on the female relations both as regards their pious duty to the deceased as also the mode of life enjoined on them in their widowhood. The question of legal necessity must moreover largely depend both upon the nature and extent of the estate taken by the heiress and the nature and extent of disposition. As Giffard, L. J., said it is absolutely impossible to define the extent and limit of the power of the widow to dispose of her husband's property for religious purposes, because it must depend upon the circumstances of the disposition whenever such disposition shall be made and must be consistent with the law regulating such disposition. (1)

2376. The law of legal necessity may be divided into two classes. In the first spiritual necessity. The necessity for worldly purposes falls into the other class. It is only in cases falling into the former class that the widow possesses larger powers. As observed by Turner, L. J. "The widow cannot of her own will alien the property, except for special purposes. For religious and charitable purposes or those which are supposed to conduce to the spiritual welfare of her husband, she has a larger power of disposition than that which she possesses for purely worldly purposes. To support an alienation for the last, she must show necessity" (2) But in one sense both are cases of legal necessity (3) since both are recognized by and subject to the control of law, though the term legal necessity when applied to worldly purposes doubtless involves some pressure from without, necessitating the raising of money for the protection or class would fall those religious acts which are recognized and designated as preservation of the estate. (4) But this is rather the test of its legality, since all expenditure is not necessary and all necessary expenditure is not legal. To be legal it must receive the sanction of law.

2377. Now law recognizes and sanctions certain heads of expenditure whether because it is incurred on religious or charitable objects, or because it is incurred for worldly purposes. In each case it is subject to the general rule that it must be moderate and reasonable, and incurred bona fide on the objects permitted by law. Law does not tolerate extravagance in the name of religion or piety. "The test in cases of this description, where a deed by a limited owner with a qualified power of alienation is impeached, is, whether the purposes for which the alienation was made are proper or legitimate . . . The test is, is the transaction fair and proper, lawful and valid and justified by Hindu Law. Necessity is only one of the phases of the test of propriety." (5) There is however one difference between necessity which is spiritual and that which is secular, since in the one case no pressure on the estate need be proved to justify the alienation. All that has to be proved is its validity. The purposes which constitute such necessity are enumerated in clauses 3 and 4. The remaining clauses deal with secular necessity, though some of them as for instance, the case of marriage and customary ceremonial gifts, are other instances of religious necessity.

2378. It has been laid down by the Privy Council that a widow entering upon her husband's estate as his heir has, as regards the management of his estate not less powers than the manager of an infant estate <sup>(1)</sup> and referring to this dictum Sergeant, C.J., said: "A widow, like a manager of the family, must be allowed a reasonable latitude in the exercise of her powers provided she acts fairly to her expectant heirs. <sup>(2)</sup> For example she may pay off a mortgage before it is due <sup>(3)</sup> and sell a portion of the estate rather than mortgage the whole though the latter course might be more beneficial to her reversioners and though it would be prejudicial to her by reducing her income, since "she does not hold the property for the benefit of the reversioners nor is she bound to raise money on her personal security." <sup>(4)</sup> As Peacock, C. J., said: "If a widow elects to sell when it would be more beneficial to mortgage, the sale could not be set aside as against the purchaser, if the widow and the purchaser are both acting honestly." <sup>(5)</sup> If there is a necessity, it is for the widow to decide how to act and there is no rule of law which obliges the widow to proceed in any particular way and the only question for the Court to consider is whether she has exceeded her power and these are always to be measured by the necessities of the case. <sup>(6)</sup> Moreover a sale is at times more advisable than a mortgage <sup>(7)</sup> and it is no blot on the sale that the widow having to raise Rs. 670 sold the property for Rs. 995. <sup>(8)</sup> The case is otherwise where the property is mortgaged as she is not bound to borrow more than her actual wants <sup>(9)</sup> and in this matter though she should not anticipate her wants, still, it does not mean that she must let the wolf in before she turns him off the door. It is merely a dictate of prudence, and she will be so judged.

2380 Benefit.—An alienation by an heiress for the "benefit" of the estate is subject to the general principles set out in section 97, with the modification that the heiress having no co-parceners and being the sole proprietor of her estate, the only benefit she has to study is that of the estate and of her reversioners. <sup>(11)</sup> The Privy Council have held the principle applicable to the manager of an infant equally applicable to alienations by a widow. <sup>(12)</sup> The title to her husband's estate having vested in his widow, she was dispossessed by her reversioner with whom she effected a compromise granting a lease of some of her properties to one of them for 60 years. On her death the next reversioner sued to eject the lessee but the Privy Council upheld the lease as made for the benefit of the estate and intended to injure no one. <sup>(13)</sup>

2381. Shradh: In the first place she is entitled to charge or alienate her inherited estate for the performance of religious rites which are conducive to the spiritual welfare of the deceased. (1) As the Privy Council said: "For religious or charitable purposes or those which are supposed to conduce to the spiritual welfare of her husband she has a larger power of disposition than that which she possesses for purely worldly purposes. To support an alienation for the last she must show necessity." (2) But there must be necessity in any case. If the late owner has left sufficient funds out of which his spiritual wants could have been met it will not justify an alienation of the estate, merely because the proceeds were spent on his Shradh.

Assuming, however that the heiress has no inherited funds for that purpose, the questions then arise: (i) What are the religious purposes which justify the alienation of his estate and (ii) to what extent is it justifiable.

2382. First as regards the religious purpose. On this point the Dayabag says "Even a gift or other alienation is permitted for the completion of her husband's funeral rites. (3) The order in which these rites are performed are as follows: Upon the death of a person his body is, as is well-known, consigned to the flames. At this time gifts have to be made to a Maha Brahmin, that is to say, a Brahmin of a lower order who receives only funeral offerings. The nature of the gifts vary, but they consist of all such things as a man requires below—house, cattle, cots and clothes, ornaments and food. Those who are brought up within the pale of the orthodox creed know too well the exactions of these priests.

On cremation of the body the ashes are collected and required to be thrown into the Ganges. This is called the Gangajali ceremony and may take place on the 13th day of death or any time later as convenient. It is a religious necessity. (4)

The relation who goes to the Ganges to commit to its holy waters the last remains of their departed relation, is enjoined to proceed to Gya a place where special merit attaches to the performance of Shradh, the feeding of Brahmins and gifts to the Gayawal priests. (6)

2383. In the Maratha country a similar sanctity attaches to a Shradh performed at Pandharpur (7) while Rajahamandry serves the same purpose to the people of the Dravid country. (8) While Sethu is mentioned as a place endowed with sanctity (9) a pilgrimage to Benares is not conducive to the spiritual welfare of any one but the pilgrim, and is therefore, not a head of a justifiable necessity. (10) And as regards Gya while a feast given there is necessary, a feast given upon one's return home has no religious significance and cannot be justified on the ground of necessity. (1)

2384. It is not every relation that can perform these obsequial rites. The duty to perform them devolves on the following relations in their order :—

(1) The son—of sons the eldest, and next to him the youngest, are most eligible.

(2) The widow—or co-widows, one and all are equally entitled.

(3) The daughter (2)—who is entitled to perform the Shradh of both her father and mother.

(4) Daughter's son.

(5) Younger brother—uterine brother and his sons being preferred to brothers of half-blood and the next younger brother to one older than the deceased.

(6) Sister's son.

(7) The father.

(8) The mother.

(9) Elder brother. The elder brother should do so especially at Gaya.

(10) Daughter-in-law.

(11) Sister—Amongst sisters the rule applicable is the same as in the case of brothers.

2385. Where a person is unable to perform the Shradh personally he may do so vicariously through another who must, however, be eligible to perform it (4), though, amongst the Uriyas, a custom was proved to appoint a Brahmin to perform these rites. (5)

2386. It is equally obligatory on the heiress not only to perform the Shradh of the last owner but also the Shradh of his other relations. So the widow must perform the Shradh of not only her husband but also the Shradh of his mother. (6)

The widow is equally under a duty to perform the funeral rites of her husband's other relations, such as for instance his grandfather, great-grandfather, mother, paternal aunt, brother's wife and other relations whose maintenance was charged on his estate.

2387. The next question, and one of some moment is the amount of such expenditure. It is evident that the amount must be reasonable and must not disappoint the just claims of other claimants and creditors. As observed by the Privy Council: "No case has gone the length of holding that the power of disposition for pious and religious purposes is unqualified." (1) In one case out of the income of Rs. 6,000 a year the court allowed about a year's income for the performance of all these ceremonies. (2) But the tendency of the courts is to check extravagance and reduce all such expenditure to a minimum and it is apparent that if in the last case Rs. 6,000 had been the value instead of the income of the estate, the court would not have tolerated its annihilation for the spiritual benefit of the deceased.

2388. Spiritual necessity.—Spiritual necessity often spoken of as the spiritual benefit of the husband is another head of necessity which justifies the alienation of inherited immoveable property. On this point the Mitakshara is silent but the Mayukh contains the following text.

Mayukh.—The prohibition of sale or other disposition of immoveable property by a widow, without the consent of takers of the heritage is given on [the authority of] Madhav. As for the text of Katyayan "After the death of the husband, the widow preserving [the honour of the family] should obtain the share of her husband so long as she lives; but she has no ownership there in respect of [its] gift, mortgage, or sale" that is a prohibition of gift of money to the bandi [bards] charan [triflers] and the like. Gifts for religious or spiritual objects and mortgage, and the like for that purpose, are of course permitted; as is plain from the aforementioned text of Prajapati, commencing with Sthavaram Jagaman etc., and from the text of Katyayan—"A widow always engaged in meritorious observances and fasts constant in the duties of celibacy intent upon restraining her passions and making holy gifts, shall reach the heavenly abodes even if she has no son." (3) justified unless it is brought strictly within the rule of spiritual necessity. <sup>(1)</sup> In some of these cases, a distinction is drawn between acts of which the religious merit is solely acquired by the female heir, and acts of which the religious merit accrues to the deceased or is shared by the female heir with him. But this distinction is not supported by the text and the sole ground which justifies the heiress to alienate any portion of the inherited estate is the spiritual necessity of the last owner. <sup>(2)</sup> In other cases the alienation may be good if supported by legal necessity but it cannot be supported under this head.

2389. It has been held that this text does not authorize the giving away of the bulk of the inherited estate to a Brahmin for the spiritual benefit of the deceased, and that "while the widow has wider powers of disposition over property inherited from her husband in making gifts for religious purposes which are calculated to benefit her husband spiritually, those powers must be exercised within the proper and reasonable limits in dealing with the immoveable property of her husband." (4) It is also pertinent to observe that the term "Spiritual necessity" must be strictly limited to purposes which the law recognizes as warranting such alienation. Any gift out of a religious or pious motive is not a gift constituting a spiritual necessity. Where the gift is of an inconsiderable portion of the estate the court will not be too strict in examining the purpose, but where it forms a considerable portion of the estate the gift cannot be

2390. The question then arises what acts constitute the spiritual necessity of the deceased owner. The performance of his shraddh and its attendant obsequial rites are doubtless such necessity. They are in fact a recognized head of necessity and have been dealt with in clause 3. But over and beyond these objects there are other items of expenditure which though not treated as of the same degree of urgency are nevertheless regarded as bordering on necessity. Such was held to be the excavation of a tank to complete the equipment of a temple which the deceased died leaving incomplete. His widow raised Rs. 520 by the grant of two perpetual leases with a view to complete the walls of the temple buildings and to excavate and consecrate a tank in connection with the temple. The court held these leases to be supported by necessity holding that excavation of the tank was itself a meritorious act <sup>(3)</sup> which it is submitted did not justify alienation of that estate apart from its utility to the estate. <sup>(4)</sup>

2391. Religious and pious gifts :—While the performance of Shraddh and Sapindikarm are directly conducive to a man's spiritual benefit, Hindu Law does not require that such ceremonies should be accompanied by a gift of land to the priests. But where the performer of Shraddh delivered as gift an inconsiderable portion of land the court upheld it as a disposition or expenditure which was reasonable or proper according to the common notions of the Hindus. <sup>(5)</sup>

The question is one of custom. For instance it is customary amongst the Uriya Zamindars to appoint a Brahmin to perform funeral and annual ceremonies. The Brahmin so appointed is styled a "Puo Brahmin." As such the widows of a Zamindar conveyed a small piece of land to him on a rent of Rs. 1-8 per annum. It was conceded that the gift was made rather for future than for past services. The court upheld the gift as supported by an indispensable religious necessity. But the fact that the land was only small in extent was also emphasized. <sup>(6)</sup> But all the same there can be no doubt that the powers of an heiress to alienate property for the spiritual benefit of the last owner cannot be weighed in golden scales. As was observed in a case, "It is unquestionable then that the widow has a larger power of disposition for religious or charitable purposes or for purposes which are supposed to conduce to the spiritual welfare of her husband than that which she possesses for purely worldly purposes. An exhaustive enumeration of these religious or charitable purposes is neither possible nor necessary." (1)

2392. In one case (2) the pandits consulted, defined religious purposes somewhat loosely, as including "dowry to a daughter, building temples for religious worship, digging tanks and the like." It is submitted that these and similar meritorious acts could not easily be brought under the category of religious or spiritual necessity. But this is probably the extreme limit. Ordinarily the gift tolerated by law must be one supported by spiritual necessity and not merely conducive to the spiritual benefit of the deceased. As was observed, "the pilgrimages and sacrifices performed by her are no doubt pious acts which might indirectly be beneficial to her husband, but they were not ceremonies which were indispensable for his spiritual benefit, such as his funeral obsequies and the periodical ceremonies incidental to those obsequies.." (3)

2393. Apart from such ceremonies the heiress is incompetent to make any gift out of the corpus, however conducive they might be to her only spiritual welfare (4) as distinct from spiritual necessity. (5) For example she cannot make a gift of land to an idol (6) not established by the full owner but by his mother for which the husband had not in his lifetime made any provision for its maintenance, and of which the dedication was prima facie one more for the widow's own spiritual welfare than for that of her husband. (7)

So an act however meritorious does not justify alienation of the estate. The digging of a tank is one such act.

2394. It was implied in the last case and it is the law that if the last owner authorizes an act, the heir would be entitled to execute the power. For instance where the testator authorized his wife to build a house, establish therein the god Mahadev, the widow was held entitled to carry out his wishes and any alienation made of the corpus would be within her power and one which the reversioner could not avoid on her death. (8) As previously stated in carrying out the behests of a testator the donee of the power acts as an agent of the donor and as such his power is not his own, but that of the testator who authorized him.

2395. Payment of debts.—The payments of debts of the last owner is another recognized head of justifiable necessity for which the heiress may alienate the corpus. She is not bound to pay them out of its current income which she has the right to appropriate to her own use. (9) But she cannot alienate the estate if she has received sufficient other property wherewith to discharge them.

2396. In the case of the heiress whether the heiress is the widow or daughter-in-law <sup>(1)</sup> or mother <sup>(2)</sup> of the last owner, it is a pious obligation which she is bound to discharge even though the debt be bared by time <sup>(3)</sup> or released by any enactment such as the Deccan Agriculturist Relief Act. <sup>(4)</sup> Even she is not bound to pay debts which the deceased owner had repudiated before his death <sup>(5)</sup> or which had been agreed to be discharged by a third party. <sup>(6)</sup> In other words her liability must in each case be existing and legal though the creditor's remedy for its enforcement may have been lost by reason of the law of limitation. <sup>(7)</sup>

Nor can she pay interest in excess of the principal in the area subject to the rule of Damdupat. <sup>(8)</sup>

2397. It has been seen that manager of a joint family is not competent to revive or pay a time barred debt (§§ 1172-1175.) In this respect the female heir has a greater liability by reason of her pious duty ; which, however, only arises qua heir <sup>(9)</sup> and on the death of the last owner, and never in his life-time. <sup>(10)</sup> Any payment made by the wife of the debt of her husband during his life-time is a voluntary payment and the husband's property cannot be made liable for payment of such debts after his death. <sup>(11)</sup>

Even where the wife takes the estate as a devisee under her husband's will she may charge his estate if he has directed that she should pay his debts out of his estate. <sup>(12)</sup> As already remarked the trade debts of a joint family stand on the same footing and the heiress is entitled to alienate the estate for the purpose of discharging them. <sup>(13)</sup> (S. 111)

another as her husband might have done, because from him the favoured creditor could have obtained as much by his diligence. On the widow, no pressure could be exercised, except through the estate, and she was bound, pressure, or no pressure to distribute amongst the creditors. There could not here have been a legal necessity, such as is prescribed as an indispensable consideration by the Judicial committee. (1) A purchaser from a widow must see that she exercises her power of sale strictly (2) or at least satisfy himself by reasonable enquiry that a sufficient cause for alienation exists." (3)

2399. Payment of Public charges.—The payment of land revenue cesses and other public charges is a case of general necessity, (4) (§ 1074) and arises out of the very necessity of preserving the estate from forfeiture and sale; since such payments are ordinarily the first charge on the land and their non-payment renders the estate itself liable to extinguishment. As the Privy Council observed, "The preservation of the estate and the costs of litigation for that purpose are objects which justify a widow in incurring debt and alienating a sufficient amount of the property to discharge it". (5) Where however, the amount of cess creates only a personal liability as it does under the Public Demands Recovery Act in Benga (6) its payment would nevertheless be a justifiable necessity, (7) the more so if a decree is passed against the heiress as representing the estate. (8)

2400. It is immaterial that with better management the Government revenue need not have threatened the very existence of the estate. (9) All that is necessary is that there should be some pressure on the estate and a danger to be averted. (10) The validity of sales for non-payment of revenue is not affected by any rule of Hindu law (11) and it is the duty of the heiress to sell a portion to save the rest. But she must not anticipate her wants. Necessity implies pressure such as an attachment of the property or at least the presence of a decree or other coercive process of law making the alienation inheritable (12) and the alienation must of course be bona fide but not a devise to defeat or deceive the reversioner. (13) Since the public charges are primarily payable out of current income it is the duty of the heiress to pay therefrom. (14) She cannot save the income of the estate for her own benefit and charge it for assessment. If this were allowed many an estate would never reach the hands of the reversioner.

2401. Costs of Litigation.—The cost of necessary litigation is another head of legal necessity but the litigation must be necessary and the cost reasonable, for, as Sir Lawrence Jenkins, C. J. observed, though “costs of litigation are a recognized head of legal necessity, that does not mean that a widow engaged in a litigation has an unlimited power of borrowing.” (1)

The heiress is entitled to alienate the estate for defraying the cost of obtaining the Succession Certificate or Letters of Administration (2) and reasonable cost of litigation (3) in recovering or preserving the estate or in defending her title. (4)

It would not justify a sale of land to embark on a speculative suit which the deceased owner had given up as lost (5) though the case might be different where the reversioner had entered upon a litigation for which he was responsible (6)

This aspect of the subject has been already considered (§§. 1080—1082)

2402. Preservation and Repairs.—The obligation of a person in possession of an estate to protect and preserve it is cast even on mortgagees and trustees. As such she has the right and is subject to the duty of alienating the estate only when it is necessary for its preservation and repairs. She cannot charge the estate for the purpose of improving it (7) or of constructing a new house unless it was a necessity. She may, of course, construct such a house out of her current income and may even charge her future income; but if she charges the estate she must show that it was necessary to shelter the household as that the old house had become uninhabitable or the like. (8) Apart from such or similar pressing necessity she cannot alienate the estate for the purpose of building costly houses and excavating tanks or wells unless they were necessary for irrigation or were proved to be otherwise beneficial to the estate. (9)

The question must in each case depend upon its own circumstances. (10)

2403. Self-maintenance.—Maintenance of the heiress herself and other dependent members of the family whom the deceased owner was bound to maintain is another head of legal necessity generally explained elsewhere. (11) Primarily she must maintain herself out of its profits and if her interest therein is so limited, she cannot alienate the corpus in any case. (12) Otherwise if the income is insufficient, she is entitled to sell the estate for her own maintenance. (13)

Her right to sell the estate depends upon the right in which she holds the estate. If she is entitled only to the rents and profits she cannot charge or alienate the corpus. But if she has the woman's estate then she is entitled to alienate it for all those purposes which law recognizes as legally necessary, amongst which her own maintenance is one such purpose. The fact that she was living with another man who presumably maintained her does not curtail her right to find her own maintenance in her heritage since the estate having once vested in her, subsequent unchastity cannot curtail her right to its enjoyment. Of course the fact that she was in the keeping of another man who maintained her might be proved as a fact to establish the absence of necessity. (1)

2404. The question of alienation raises the question of the quantum of maintenance. That the widow is entitled to maintain herself in a fair degree of comfort has been already seen (S. 81). The same rule applies to all female heiresses. The term maintenance not only comprises the bare cost of living but also the cost incurred in the performance of such religious rites as are usual or might be customary. Such are for instance the performance of the annual Shradh, the distribution of charities and the observance of fasts and festivals and in fact compliance with all such caste usages as might be reasonably expected from the heiress in her position. (2) The rule applies to all female heirs whether a widow succeeding to her husband or daughter inheriting to her father. (3) The heiress must not forecast her wants, but this does not imply that she cannot alienate the estate except for her past maintenance. All it means is that she must not alienate it except when there is urgent necessity in the near future. (4)

2405. If the purpose is obvious the means adopted by the widow may not be of the best. But they should not be too narrowly scrutinized. So where the widow could not maintain herself because she had no means to cultivate the land, she was held justified in mortgaging it so as to enable her to resume cultivation and so maintain herself. (5)

2406. Maintenance of dependents.—The heiress is not bound to pay for the maintenance and the marriage of relations of the last owner out of the current income of the estate for which the estate is legally chargeable. (7) Section 73 specifies the persons whom a person is personally liable to maintain. On his death the liability to maintain them continues chargeable to his estate and the heiress is entitled to alienate the estate for that purpose. So it has been held that the expenses incurred by the widow for the marriage of a daughter are recoverable from the father's estate (§ 1080). The maintenance of the grandsons is also a moral though not a legal obligation for which the heiress may alienate the estate. (8)

A man is not either legally or morally bound to maintain his mother-in-law. No more is his widow who is not justified in alienating her husband's estate in order to maintain her. (9)

2407. Marriage gifts.—The marriage of unmarried daughters and sisters Cl. (11), (12.) is an obligation which would constitute legal necessity in the hands of the heiress (§§ 921, 922).

Customary presents such as the gift of a reasonable portion of the immoveable property to the daughter <sup>(1)</sup> or to the son-in-law <sup>(2)</sup> on the occasion of their marriage or Gowna or Dwiragaman or second marriage <sup>(3)</sup> and the like, are other examples of necessity already set out (§§ 1080-1082).

Gifts on these occasions are supported not on the ground of their spiritual necessity but as customary and common. <sup>(4)</sup>

The term marriage in this connection includes betrothal, <sup>(5)</sup> marriage <sup>(6)</sup> and the Gowna <sup>(7)</sup> and all the ceremonies antecedent and subsequent which attend it.

But the expenses of the marriage of a daughter's daughter <sup>(8)</sup> or a nephew <sup>(9)</sup> is not a legal necessity.

2408. Other ceremonial gifts.—Small customary gifts on other ceremonial occasions are sanctioned by the usages of all communities. Such is the gift of a small area of land on the occasion of the father's <sup>(10)</sup> or the performance of the mother's S'radh. <sup>(11)</sup>

Surrender of woman's estate.

259. (1) The heiress may surrender her entire interest to the next reversioner, or to any one or more of such reversioners with the consent of the rest, provided that where the next reversioner is a female it may be surrendered to the male reversioner next in order with her consent.

(2) Such surrender does not affect the validity of her prior alienations.

2409. Analogous Law.—It had been held in a long series of cases of the Calcutta High Court <sup>(1)</sup> that it was competent to an heiress to relinquish, resign or surrender her estate in favour of her next reversioner. This view was challenged in other cases of the same and other courts on the ground that a Hindu widow could not by uniting with one of many others having identical interests in expectancy on the happening of a certain event anticipate that event and convert such individual expectancy into an immediate estate of full proprietorship. If this were permissible, it would virtually confer upon a Hindu widow the right of directing the succession to her husband's property in her life-time when in law it only happens upon her death. <sup>(2)</sup> But the Privy Council preferred to follow the majority of the Calcutta cases and said, "It may be accepted that, according to Hindu Law the widow can accelerate the estate of the heir by conveying absolutely and destroying her life estate. It was essentially necessary to withdraw her own life-estate, so that the whole estate should get vested at once in the grantee. The necessity of the removal of the obstacle of the life-estate, is a practical check on the frequency of such conveyances."<sup>(3)</sup>

2410. In other words there can be no surrender unless it relates to be whole interest in the whole estate. <sup>(4)</sup> The effect of such surrender is to vest it in the next heir the inheritance which he would take if she at the time were to die. <sup>(5)</sup> A surrender by a widow to those who are entitled to the estate is looked upon in the Hindu law as meritorious, since it restores the property in its natural channel. <sup>(6)</sup> A surrender is not an alienation <sup>(7)</sup> and it does not require the presence of consideration or legal necessity to support it. <sup>(8)</sup>

The various requirements of such surrender are noted in the section but require to be more particularly emphasized.

2411. Surrender must relate to the entire interest.—In the first place the surrender must relate to the entire interest then vested in the heir. It cannot be made reserving any portion by the widow. (1) As observed by the Privy Council this is some security to the widow from whom no reversioner can obtain the estate piecemeal. Of course, the fact that the heiress cannot surrender any but the whole estate does not limit her right of alienation. So where a widow sold half the estate to the then reversioner and he executed an instrument giving her the other half of the property, the court upheld the transaction by which each obtained absolutely a moiety of the estate. (2) But it is submitted that whatever might be the effect of such transfer inter partes, it could not affect the ultimate reversioner or alter the heiress's estate into an absolute estate. Though the doctrine of acceleration of the inheritance by surrender by the widow primarily refers to a male, it makes no exception against a female reversioner and the widow may consequently surrender her estate to her daughter, in the form of a gift (3) or otherwise, provided it conforms to the rule here stated. But this does not preclude her from stipulating for and reserving some property for her own maintenance. (4)

2412. Prior dispositions unaffected.—It goes without saying that surrender takes effect as from the moment it is made and has no retrospective effect upon any prior alienation made by the heiress.

The questions of surrender and alienation have in fact to be regarded from two entirely different standpoints. The question in the one case is—was it the surrender of the entire interest in the entire estate to the nearest reversioner, in which case the question of necessity is immaterial: while the question in the other case is—was the alienation justified by necessity, it being immaterial who the alienee was and whether the property alienated was the whole or only a part of the woman's estate (5).

2413. Position of the heiress after surrender.—The doctrine of surrender owes its origin to the desire to relieve women of the management of property. (6) The surrendering heiress is sometimes spoken of as having committed suicide, or as being civilly dead. These are mere figures of speech and do not involve the assumption that the heiress has thenceforward no civil rights, or that she was ever in the position of one who suffers civil death, as by her remarriage, or abandonment of worldly pursuits. "A woman who surrenders is clearly not civilly dead for any other purpose than for the purpose of bringing in the next reversioner as heir at once to her husband's estate. She continues to own her own stridhan and the obligation of all persons who take her husband's estate to maintain her which is an absolute obligation thrown by the Hindu law, cannot be destroyed by her surrender thereof. She does not become a Sanyasi, because she surrenders her husband's estate. She is entitled to acquire properties, to retain her stridhan and to bring suits and she remains competent to enter into contractual and other legal obligations" (7)

In this case the surrender by the widow and a reconveyance of the moiety were made on the same day and it was not pleaded, though sought to be argued for the first time in appeal, that they were parts of the same transaction, which the court did not permit. But it is clear that the two contemporaneous deeds could not be treated as independent transactions. When it is so, there is nothing to prevent the reversioner from conveying an absolute estate to the heiress but of property surrendered to him. (1) And even where he conveys it as a part of the same transaction both he and his legal representative claiming through him would be equally estopped. (2) The principle of this case has been carried even further in another case in which it has been held that where a widow conveys the whole of her limited estate to the next reversioner in consideration of an undertaking by such reversioner that he would reconvey a portion of such property to a person named by the widow, the conveyance is valid and is not vitiated by such agreement; and other reversioners cannot impeach the title of such reversioner and that of the person to whom the property is thus conveyed. (3) This view is supported on the ground that the title having vested in the reversioner, it was open to him to convey any portion of his estate to any person he liked and the fact that he had previously agreed to convey it to the widow's nominee as a consideration for his own surrender did not vitiate his conveyance.

The rule that the surrender must comprise the entire estate does not mean surrender of all interest in some of the estate though in favour of the whole body of the reversioners. (4)

2414. Surrender for consideration.—It has already been seen that no consideration is required to support this surrender. But the question remains whether the payment of consideration vitiates it. It has been held not, provided it is not a device to divide the estate with the reversioner. (5) As Shankaran Nair, J., said: "I am unable to agree with the view that the validity of the surrender of her interest or title to the reversioner depends upon the motive of the widow or upon any question of any benefit that may accrue to her or to any other person. Such might have been the case if the widow were holding the property in trust for any purpose or for the benefit of the actual reversioner at the time of her death." (6) In other words, the estate is her own and there is nothing to prevent her from surrendering it upon terms. For instance, there is nothing wrong in her surrendering the estate subject to her maintenance being charged on the estate so that it is enforceable even when the estate has passed to a transferee. (7) By surrender she may convert his estate into an annuity (8) in which case subject to the payment of an annuity the transferee would acquire an absolute interest. (9)

2415. This is the inevitable result of the concession of such power. As observed by Garth, C. J., who even doubted the rule: "But there is no concealing the fact that although such a relinquishment may be made by a widow in perfect good faith and even under such circumstances as to be a meritorious self-sacrifice, it is nevertheless possible, and indeed it not unfrequently happens that a widow who is anxious to turn her husband's estate into money may arrange with the next heir of her husband for the time being to alienate the estate to some third person for their mutual benefit. They may both share in the profits of such transaction, and it sometimes happens that in this way the estate is alienated from the husband's family so that the person who would be the next male heir at the widow's death is virtually deprived of his rights. But if it is once established as a matter of law that a widow may relinquish her estate in favour of her husband's heir for the time being, it seems impossible to prevent any alienation which the widow and the next heir may thus agree to make. And it seems equally impossible to deny that for a long series of years this court has treated and considered such alienations as lawful. (1)

2416. It then follows that any contract between the heir and the reversioner for the reservation or transfer of any property or benefit is not illegal, and where the transferee assigns any land to the heir the right in which and the terms whereupon she would take the lands must depend upon the terms of the transfer. If they convey to her an absolute estate, she will take it in that right. (2)

2417. But there are obvious limits to this rule. The surrender must be a bona fide surrender, not a device to divide the estate with the reversioner. (3) The position whether it is the one or the other must depend upon the quantum of consideration and other circumstances of each case.

2418. It must be in favour of the next reversioner.—Secondly, such surrender can only be made in favour of the next reversioner and not in favour of any of the reversioners near or remote (4) except that there is no objection to her surrendering her estate in favour of the second reversioner with the consent of the first reversioner. (5) The position is the same as if the heiress had surrendered in favour of the first reversioner and he in his turn had assigned his interest in favour of the second reversioner. So a gift to the daughter's son with the consent of the daughter has been upheld. (6) But the contrary has been laid down by the same court in several cases (7) in some of which the language used is fatal to her very right. (8) The question was considered by the Calcutta High Court who held the rule to be well established that "the widow may convey to the next reversioner, or to a third party with the consent of the next reversioner, the whole or any portion of the estate, and the transferee will acquire an absolute interest." (9)

So it has been held in Madras that the surrender need not be definitely to the next heir if that next heir agrees to be passed over. (10)

2419. At any rate since the surrender in favour of the next reversioner is unobjectionable there is nothing to prevent the surrender being made in favour of a female reversioner, such as the daughter. <sup>(1)</sup>

Presumption of legal necessity. 260. (1) An alienation for value or otherwise supported by legal necessity of any property made by the heiress with the consent of the next male reversioner will be presumed to be valid and supported by legal necessity.

(2) But where the alienation relates to her entire interest in the estate and is consented to by all her next reversioners it will be conclusive against the actual reversioners when the succession opens.

Explanation :—(1) Such consent may be express or implied and may be given contemporaneously with or subsequently to the transaction.

(2) No consent is valid —

(a) if it is given without full knowledge of the nature and effect of the transaction,

(b) if it is given or obtained collusively or fraudulently with intent to defeat the claims of a future reversioner;

(c) or if it is not given in good faith with intent to confirm the transaction.

2420. Analogous Law.—This section lays down a rule, which after some deviations, has now become settled. It rests on the principle universally recognized <sup>(1)</sup> that since a widow is entitled to relinquish her estate to the next male reversioner, it follows as a necessary corollary, that whatever she may validly relinquish in his favour she may equally alienate with his consent. <sup>(2)</sup> And so in a case decided in 1861 the Privy Council said: "It may be taken as established that an alienation by her (the widow) which would not otherwise be legitimate may become so if made with the consent of her husband's kindred."<sup>(3)</sup> Referring to this rule in another case they said "Their Lordships do not mean to impugn those authorities which lay down that a transaction of this kind may become valid by the consent of the husband's kindred but the kindred in such case must generally be understood to be all those who are likely to be interested in disputing the transaction. At all events, there should be such a concurrence of the members of the family as suffices to raise a presumption that the transaction was a fair one, and one justified by Hindu Law."<sup>(4)</sup> In a later case this was explained to require "that ordinarily the consent of the whole body of persons constituting the next reversion should be obtained. though there may be cases in which special circumstances may render the strict enforcement of this rule impossible."<sup>(5)</sup> In another case the value of such consent was held to lie in raising merely presumption in favour of the validity of the transaction. "The law relating to the dealings of a Hindu widow with her husband's estate which devolves on her in default of issue is now too well settled to need a prolonged consideration. To be valid as against the reversioners, or to affect their reversionary rights, a charge created by a Hindu widow or an alienation effected by her can be supported only by proof aliunde that such debt was contracted or such alienation was made for valid and legal necessity and the onus of establishing such necessity rests heavily on the person who claims the benefit of transactions with a Hindu widow or other females taking similar estates. The requirement of the law may however, be fulfilled by proving the consent or concurrence of the reversioners to or in the transactions."<sup>(6)</sup> This view was reiterated in another case in which they said: "As against them (i.e., the reversioners) it is a fair inference from their conduct that they believed that the arrangement had been made in good faith and under such circumstances of necessity as would give it validity according to Hindu law and it has always been a feature of Hindu Law as administered by this Board to attach great weight to the sanction by expectant reversioners of an alienation of property by a Hindu woman as affording evidence that the alienation was under circumstances which rendered it lawful and valid"<sup>(7)</sup>.

2421. In another case they formulated the following proposition :—When the alienation of the whole or part of the estate is to be supported on the ground of necessity, then if the necessity is not proved aliunde and the alienee does not prove enquiry on his part and honest belief in the necessity, the consent of such reversioners as might fairly be expected to be interested to question the transaction will be held to afford a presumptive proof which if not rebutted by contrary, proof will validate the transaction as a right and proper one.<sup>(1)</sup> This case now settles that the consent need not be of all reversioners, but of only the presumptive reversioners. A consent of a remote reversioner creates no presumption of propriety.<sup>(2)</sup> The alienation by a widow of her deceased husband's estate held by her may be validated if it can be shown to be a surrender.

2422. In no case have the Privy Council insisted that the alienation should extend to the entire estate, or that the consent of reversioners is conclusive of its validity. All that they have laid down is that it is a strong prima facie evidence of its validity but that the strength of it must vary according to the circumstances of each case.

2423. That the presumption so raised may be rebutted was laid down by a Full Bench of the Calcutta Court who held that "the alienation by way of mortgage by a Hindu widow as heiress of a portion of the estate of her deceased husband, without proof either of legal necessity or of reasonable enquiry, and honest belief as to its existence, but with the consent of the next reversioner, for the time being, will be valid and binding on the actual reversioner if the presumption of legal necessity or of reasonable enquiry and honest belief raised by such consent is not rebutted by more cogent evidence."<sup>(i)</sup> And on the question of alienations generally Sir Lawrence Jenkins, C. J., summed up the law as follows :—"To uphold an alienation by a widow of her deceased husband's estate where she is his heir, it should be shown (i) that there was legal necessity ; or (ii) that the alienee after reasonable enquiry as to the necessity acted honestly in the belief that it existed, or (iii) that there was such consent of the next heirs as would raise a presumption, either of the existence of necessity, or of reasonable inquiry, and honest belief as to its existence, or (iv) that there was a consent of the next heirs to an alienation capable of being supported by reference to the theory of the relinquishment of the widow's entire interest and consequent acceleration of the interest of the consenting heirs. Where any one amongst the first three positions is established, the alienation may be of the whole or any part of the husband's estate but where the fourth alone is proved then the alienation must be of the whole.<sup>(4)</sup> This view is in accord with many of the previous cases of the same<sup>(5)</sup> and of other Courts.<sup>(6)</sup>

2424. Surrender of estate.—The rule stated in clause (1) is now settled by the Privy Council, that in this clause is supported by a Full Bench decision of the Calcutta High Court. (1) The difference between the two classes is the difference of degree. The alienation if partial and consented to by only some of the reversioners, would be presumed to be valid but the presumption is one of fact and as such rebuttable and may be rebutted by showing the contrary. On the other hand where the alienation relates to the entire estate and is consented to by all the reversioners the presumption is then one of law and becomes conclusive not only against the consenting reversioners but also those who are the next reversioners when the estate falls in. It may be asked why should not the same rule apply to a partial alienation if consented to by all the reversioners. The reason given is that such a relinquishment must relate to the entire estate and this derivative rule cannot relate to anything less.

2425. Consent and ratification.—The consent requisite to create the presumption or to validate the transfer may be express or implied; and given at the time of the transfer or the same may be ratified by any subsequent act or acquiescence omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur et mandato priori acquiparatur. (2) The question of consent is one of fact and one which depends upon the circumstances of each case. Such consent may be given by the reversioner joining in the conveyance as a consenting party (3) or he may execute an independent consent deed (4) or by attesting the deed noting thereon that he approved of the transfer (5) or by other evidence showing that the reversioner being aware of the transfer, had either consented to or acquiesced in it.

The mere fact that the reversioner has attested the deed is held by the Privy Council to be no proof of consent, since it is no proof that the attester knew of the contents of the deed (6).

2426. Intelligent consent.—Since the reversioner's consent dispenses with the proof of legal necessity it follows that in order to have that effect his consent must be given after full knowledge of the facts and an intelligent appreciation of its nature and effect upon his own right. A person who is too young (7) or too old (8) to appreciate the nature and effect of his consent is naturally out of the question. So the Privy Council said "In order to raise such a presumption the consent of the deceased's kindred to his widow's or daughter's alienation must be shown to be given with a knowledge of the effect of what they were doing and an intelligent intention to consent to such effect." (9) The facts of the case in which this passage occurs were these. One Khairati Lal died leaving him surviving his daughter Achan Kuar and her son Inayat. Achan succeeded to her father's estate which her husband Lalji managed for her and otherwise represented her under a power of attorney executed in his favour.

CI. (2)

As such, Achan, her mother Hulas Kuar and her son Inayat joined with the husband in executing one mortgage for Rs. 10,000 on the 2nd December 1877 and the same party except Hulas Kuar executed another mortgage on 1st April 1881 for Rs. 20,000 on foot of which the mortgagee sued the daughter and her son's whose execution was relied on to raise a presumption in favour of their validity. The Privy Council found that Achan Kuar was a pardanashin and Inayat just of age who was alleged to have signed the deeds because filial duty prevented him from disobeying his father's order. Their Lordships held that Inayat's signature was given when he had not sufficient maturity of understanding to judge of the nature of his act, that Achan was a pardanashin and it was on the plaintiff mortgagee to prove that the mortgage was executed for legal necessity. He relied on the presumption which had failed and apart from it he had given no evidence. The plaintiff contended that the question of legal necessity was not raised or put in issue but their Lordships observed that it was for the plaintiff who claimed from a limited owner to plead and prove all circumstances legalising his mortgage and that he had failed to prove either that the pardanashin mortgagor had executed them after the appreciation of their effect or that they were supported by legal necessity.

2427. This case then shows that the presumption arising under the rule is only one which the court may make due regard being had to all the circumstances of the case and that where it appears that the executant was a pardanashin and the consenting reversioner a man just come of age and not free to form an independent judgment it will refuse to act on the presumption and call upon the alienee to establish his case by proof of legal necessity. As their Lordships observed in another case, "when a stringent equity arising out of an alleged consent by the reversioner is sought to be enforced against them, such consent must be established by positive evidence that upon an intelligent understanding of the nature or the dealings they concurred in binding their interest and that such consent should not be inferred from ambiguous acts or be supported by dubious oral testimony". (1)

2428. In this case the estate of one Shyamlalsingh was inherited by his widow Nawab Kumari who mortgaged them by two deeds to one Bhagat who obtained a decree in execution of which he purchased them. The plaintiffs who were Shyamlal's brother's sons and as such Nawab Kumari's reversioners sued the mortgagee purchaser for possession of the properties on the ground that the mortgagor had no right to alien them beyond her own lifetime. The defence was legal necessity and consent by the reversioners. As to the latter, the only fact relied on was that some of Shyamlal's nephews had purchased the stamp and wrote out the mortgagor Nawab Kumari's name and that two of them were attesting witnesses to the deed. But the nearest reversioner at the time was Shyamlal's brother Raghubir and the acts of the nephews were held to be insufficient to create the presumption of legal necessity as there was no act done by the nephews from which their intelligent concurrence could be inferred

(1) Hari Kishen v. Kashi Pershad, 42 C. 876 (886) P. C.

(1) But the case would probably have been differently decided if the nephews were the next reversioners.

2429. Value of recitals. Recitals in deeds are by themselves not sufficient evidence of legal necessity, though they are evidence as between the parties to the conveyance and those who claim under them. If they remain unchallenged for a long time by persons whose interest is adversely affected by them they would furnish evidence upon which the court may find the fact as more consistent with probability. (2) Such was the case of one Brij Narain who died childless in 1845 leaving him surviving his two widows G and J. G died in June 1890 and J in 1902. During their lives they disposed of all the properties inherited by them from their husbands by deeds executed at intervals which all contained recitals of facts which if true justified the sales. On the death of J the plaintiff a remote reversioner sued for possession of the estate challenging the sales, two of which he had himself attested, as unsupported by legal necessity of which the recitals were the only material evidence. Referring to them the Lord Chancellor said: "But in such a case as the present their Lordships do not think that these recitals can be disregarded, nor, on the other hand, can any fixed and inflexible rule be laid down as to the proper weight which they are entitled to receive. If the deeds were challenged at the time, or near the date of their execution so that independent evidence would be available, the recitals would deserve but slight consideration and certainly should not be accepted as proof of the facts. But as time goes by, and all the original parties to the transaction and all those who could have given evidence on the relevant facts have grown old or passed away, a recital consistent with the probability and circumstances of the case, assumes greater importance and cannot lightly be set aside; for it should be remembered that the actual proof of the necessity which justified the deed is not essential to establish its validity. It is only necessary that a representation should have been made to the purchaser that such necessity existed, and that he should have acted honestly and made proper enquiry to satisfy himself of its truth. The recital is clear evidence of the representation, and, if the circumstances are such as to justify a reasonable belief that an enquiry would have confirmed its truth, then when proof of actual enquiry has become impossible, the recital, coupled with such circumstances, would be sufficient evidence to support the deed. To hold otherwise would result in deciding that a title becomes weaker as it grows older, so that a transaction perfectly honest and legitimate when it took place would ultimately be incapable of justification merely owing to the passage of time." (3)

2430. Bona fide consent.—Again the consent to be given must be bona fide consent, that is to say, consent given with the object of validating a transfer as supported by legal necessity. The fact that the reversioner receives a consideration for so doing does not invalidate his consent though it may affect his bona fides and weaken the presumption otherwise arising as to the legality of the transfer. (4) And so far as the consenting reversioner is concerned he will be estopped. (5) But a consent given or obtained by collusion or fraud in order to validate a transaction otherwise invalid or unsupported by legal necessity is of no effect and would not support the transaction even though consented to by the next reversioner. <sup>(1)</sup> Since it is not the law that consent takes the place of legal necessity but is only evidence of its existence and if it appears or is shown that it did not exist, the presumption arising as to its existence can no longer alter the fact.

2431. From the fact that consent of the next reversioner raises a presumption of legal necessity it follows that such consent must be to an alienation made to some one other than the consenting reversioner himself. If the transfer is made in his favour he must either prove legal necessity or surrender and in the latter case, the alienation will be subject to the special rule governing it. (S. 259.)

2432. The power of the next reversioner to consent to a transfer is personal to him and cannot be delegated by him to his executor. <sup>(2)</sup>

2434. Consent cannot legalize the creation of an estate unknown to the law. So where the widow and mother of the owner provided for the descent of their estate on their death to the natural brothers of the adopted son and the deed was consented to by the next reversioner it was held that his consent could not legalize the devolution of the estate in a line different from that prescribed by the law. <sup>(6)</sup>

2435 Consent of female reversioner immaterial.—In order to let in the operation of this rule the consent must be of the next male reversioner, since females ordinarily take only a limited estate, and they cannot by their consent confer an absolute title which by reason of their sex they are themselves precluded from taking. <sup>(7)</sup> This exception applies equally to Bombay irrespective of the rule that certain females take there an absolute estate. (1) But though the next female reversioner may not consent to a surrender to a remote reversioner there is nothing to prevent her from joining the heiress in conveying the estate to her own son (2)

2436. When next reversioner a minor.—It would seem that when the next reversioner is a minor his consent may be obtained through his guardian (3) though in this case the minor on attaining majority may repudiate his guardian's consent.

2437. Alienation otherwise valid.—The rule here stated is only a rule of evidence dispensing with the proof of legal necessity where it may be presumed from the consent of the next reversioner. But where such consent fails the transaction may nevertheless be good and upheld by proof of legal necessity aliundi. And where it is good apart from legal necessity, it will be upheld even though the parties misunderstood their rights. So where the widow and mother of the last owner effected a partition providing for the devolution of their estate by inheritance on the natural brothers of the son whom the widow had adopted and this deed was signed by the next reversioner it was held that the deed was divisible, into two parts that which effected the division of the estate inter parte required no consent of the next reversioner and was therefore valid without their consent-but that which provided for the descent of the estate in a line different from that prescribed by law was a thing which the widow could not do either with or without the reversioner's consent which therefore did not estop him and who could therefore recover on his title as if he had never consented.(4)

An alienation by a female heir though not supportable as a surrender may yet be held binding as a compromise of a claim (5) or as a family settlement.

2438. Estoppel by consent—From the fact that consent is evidence of necessity and even creates a presumption, it is clear it is strong evidence against the consenting reversioners(6) and it may amount to an estoppel against them and their legal representatives. But since one reversioner does not claim through another, there is no privity of estate between the two even though they be related as father and son. (7) The widow entered into an arrangement with her three daughters and their sons dividing her entire estate among them and three daughters acted up to this arrangement for 38 years after which one of them sued the purchaser of the property from another on the the widow's death by her right of survivorship. Her claim was decreed by the Subordinate Judge but it was dismissed on appeal both the High Court and the Privy Council holding the plaintiff bound by the family arrangement to which she was a party and which she had not repudiated for so long(8) A reversioner is not estopped by taking the mortgage of the property from the heiress's donee since such mortgage is not consistent with his reversionary right. ## CHAPTER XXV.

REVERSIONERS AND THEIR RIGHTS.

2439. Topical Introduction.—Under the English law of real property “a reversion is where the residue of the estate always doth continue in him that made the particular estate, or where the particular estate is derived out of the estate”. (1) It is so called because the land returns to the grantor on the determination of the particular estate. So if an estate in fee simple be granted to A for life and the remainder to B, the estate of A is the estate in possession and is called the “particular estate” (2) and B’s estate is called a “remainder.” (3) But if the grant be to A for life with no subsequent estate to another, the latter continues in the grantor and is called a reversion. (4) The ultimate estate is always an estate in fee simple and is called a remainder or reversion as it is granted out or continues in the grantor. (5)

2440. The term “reversioner” is born of Anglo-Indian law. It is not to be found in the Sanskrit texts. The term owes its origin to the close similarity between the rights of a Hindu reversioner and those of the English reversioner or remainderman. Even the Hindu widow was at one time spoken of as a life tenant; but it was soon perceived that she was not a tenant, but the owner and her estate not a tenancy, because there was no one else in whom the ownership could vest on her estate coming into being. The only person in whom the estate could possibly vest is the reversioner, but his estate was not a vested interest at all but a mere contingency, and that therefore full ownership must remain in the widow whose estate was one of complete ownership qualified by use. These qualifications were partly necessitated by reason of her sex and her presumed incapacity to exercise all the rights of ownership and partly by a feeling that the natural course of devolution of property was in the male line and that females though allowed to come in did so by sufferance on whose death the succession should revert to the natural line from which it had become diverted into the female line. This is the doctrine of reverter referred to by the Privy Council (6) and it explains both the term reversioners as also their rights.

2441. The female heiress being the owner of her inheritance and the reversioner having nothing but a spes successionis, this chapter deals with the extent of that interest and of the protective equity to which it is held entitled. The right of the reversioner to protect his reversion is now beyond dispute, but it is a right necessarily limited and should not be extended beyond the necessities of the case. The cases have defined with some particularity, its nature and scope.

2442. The woman’s estate acquired by inheritance or partition being thus limited, those interested in the reversion become naturally interested in the estate and it is clear that they are entitled to some protective equity during the continuance of the life estate as they are entitled to the definition of their rights upon its determination.

rest.

261. (1) So long as the estate is vested in the heiress the interest of her reversioners to succeed to it is a mere spes successionis and is incapable of being the subject of any contract, surrender or disposal.

(2) One reversioner does not derive his title from another but all derive their title equally from the last full owner.

2443. Analogous Law.—Both the clauses of this section are now settled by the decisions of the Privy Council. (1) As to the reversioner's right in relation to the heiress they said, 'A Hindu reversioner has no right or interest in praesenti in the property which the female owner holds for her life. Until it "vests in him on her death, should he survive her, he has nothing to assign, or to relinquish or even to transmit to his heirs. His right becomes concrete only on her demise. Until then it is a mere spes successionis. His guardian, if he happens to be a minor, cannot bargain with it on his behalf or bind him by any contractual engagement in respect thereto." (2)

2444. From the fact that the heiress takes a full estate though her interest is qualified it follows that the estate vests in her for the time being (3) and that the heirs expectant on her demise have no vested interest but merely a hope of succession. (4) This interest is a mere chance dependent upon their being alive at her death. As such it is not property and possesses none of its attributes. It cannot be transferred (5) or be the subject of any contract or devise.

2445. As the Privy Council observed "A Hindu reversioner has no right or interest in praesenti in the property which the female owner holds for her life. Until it vests in him on her death, should he survive her, he has nothing to assign, or to relinquish or even to transmit to his heirs. His right becomes concrete only on her demise; until then it is a mere spes successionis. His guardian, if he happened to be a minor cannot bargain with it on his behalf or bind him by any contractual engagement in respect thereto." (6)

2446. But here the reversioner was a minor and reference to arbitration on his behalf a subterfuge to divide the estate. But if the reversioner is adult and contracts with reference to his future rights, his contract would be indistinguishable from any other contract relating to future property, and though there cannot be a disposal of a non-existent property, there is nothing to prevent its being made the subject of a valid contract; though being a contract relating to a contingency, it has to be closely watched.

2447. So where the widow entered into an arrangement with the nearest reversioner for the time being by which she conveyed part of her widow's estate to the reversioner and he in turn purported to give her an absolute estate in the remainder, it was held to be an arrangement which did not bind the actual reversioner. (1) The reversioner has nothing to renounce (2) and nothing that could be seized in execution of a decree against him. (3) In case of insolvency it is not his property which could be made available to his creditors (4) and an agreement amongst presumptive reversioners to divide it when it fell in, would at least be an agreement to divide future property which will convey no title, in praesenti (5) though being an agreement, it might be specifically enforced upon the estate becoming vested in the reversioner. So where the owner died leaving his estate to his widow B who devised to her daughter C who in her turn devised it to her husband D. On B's death her reversioner E claimed the estate, but subsequently compromised their claim with D by which D gave certain lands to E in consideration of E's withdrawing his claim to the rest of the property. On a suit by B's mortgagee against D the question arose whether D was assignee or assignee of the reversion. In the former case he would take subject to the mortgage. In the latter he would not take any rights. It was held that D's compromise with E may amount to E's waiver of his reversionary right, but it could not amount to an assignment clothing D with the status of a reversioner and that therefore D could not dispute the validity of B's mortgage on the ground of legal necessity. (6)

2448. So in another case on the death of a widow disputes having arisen between the husband's agnate and the daughter as to the latter's right to succeed to her mother, the question was referred to arbitrators, before whom the daughter's husband purporting to act as well for her as for her infant son A came to an agreement with the agnates, by which some moveable property and two small fractional shares of certain lands which stood in her and mother's name were given to her, and all right to the immoveable property of her father was abandoned in favour of the agnates. Her infant son was absolutely ignored in the compromise. The arbitrators passed an award on the basis of this compromise and latter on a decree was passed upon the basis of the award, in spite of the daughter's opposition. In a suit by A, inter alia for a declaration that the compromise did not bind him, it was held that the bargaining of the reversionary interest of A in the guise of an arbitration was ineffective and null and void; that even if

(4) S. 90 (m) C. P. C. In Chidambaramma v. Hussainamma, 39 M. 565 it was held that a sale for her husband's debts made against the widow binds the reversionary interest; but it does not justify its seizure and sale as such.

A had an existing right in the property his mother had no power to enter into an arrangement which wiped out all the interest of the minor without consideration ; and that as the conditions which make a decree against a Hindu widow binding on the estate were binding in this case, the decree against A's mother did not bind him. (1)

2449. But here the reversioner was a minor and reference to arbitration on his behalf a subterfuge to divide the estate. But if the reversioner is adult and contracts with reference to his future rights, his contract would be indistinguishable from any other contract relating to future property and though there cannot be a disposal of a non-existent property there is nothing to prevent its being made the subject of a valid contract ; though being a contract relating to a contingency it has to be closely watched.

2450. But in another case the compromise related to an impartible estate. The owner had bequeathed it absolutely to his widow whom his reversioner sued for possession on the ground that the will was invalid, but compromised his suit with the widow acknowledging her as the "gaddinashin" for her life and on her death the estate should fall on the reversioner or any of his representatives then alive. The reversioner predeceased the widow and his own widow sued for possession of the estate on the strength of the compromise which the court decreed though no attempt was made to distinguish its earlier cases. (2) But the decision was apparently based on the rule that a compromise of a disputed claim bound the parties and their representatives. In other words, while a reversionary right cannot be transferred surrendered or renounced, it is an interest which may support a compromise. This was the ratio decidendi of another case in which the court upheld a similar compromise on the ground that it amounts to an arrangement which is not the transfer of an expectancy prohibited by S. 6 (a) of the Transfer of Property Act but the settlement by parties litigating on doubtful rights in which the parties define their respective interests, and which the courts upheld for the sake of preserving the peace of families. (3)

2451. Reversioner's title.—It is settled law that one reversioner does not derive title from another but from the last full owner, (4)

Gl. (2) so that, strictly speaking, he is not bound by any representation made by or any adjudication had between the last limited owner, and one reversioner and another (5), though on the last point the Courts have extended the principle of res judicata as equally extending to the reversioner, but as pointed out before, it is so on the ground of public convenience. the same rule cannot apply to admissions as to which the Privy Council observed: "According to Indian law the claimants of 1847 were but expectant heirs with a spes successionis. The appellants claim in their own right as heirs of Mohar when the succession opened and it would be a novel proposition to hold that a person so claiming is bound by contracts made by every person through whom he traces his descent." (1) Reversioners do not even derive their title through their parents and any statement made by the latter is not therefore admissible against them. (2) "There is no privity of estate between one reversioner and another as such and therefore an act or omission by one reversioner cannot bind another reversioner who does not claim through him." (3) Consequently the fact that one has consented to an alienation by the heiress does not estop another from contesting it.

2452. But in Madras it has been held that the daughter's sons inherit jointly under the ordinary law of inheritance with right of survivorship so that there is right of representation inter se. (4)

2453. A reversioner, (though not presumptive) has been held entitled to redeem property sold in execution of a decree against the female heir as provided in O. 21 R. 89 of the Code of Civil Procedure (5).

2454. Limits of his Rights.—The act which entitles the reversioner to sue must be an act which endangers the reversion directly and immediately and not indirectly and remotely.

As already stated an act in the nature of a preparation does not give the reversioner the right to sue. So it has been held that a reversioner cannot sue for a declaration that an authority to adopt given by the husband is forged (6) or that a will made by the heiress bequeathing her estate to certain persons purporting to be in pursuance of an oral direction given by her husband, is invalid (7) since such a will might be cancelled by her at any time. But though this was conceded (8) the Privy Council did not reverse the decisions of the two courts below concurrently made in the deliberate exercise of a discretion entrusted to them by law. But such cases illustrate the practice of the Privy Council. They do not affect the rule.

2455. Estoppel of Reversioner.—But though the reversioner cannot contract or compromise his right and no right accrues by reason of such contract or compromise, it may create an estoppel which may preclude the reversioner from making a claim by reason of his contract or compromise. Here the right arises not by reason of the contract, but by reason of the estoppel the principle of which is one of universal application. So where a person (A) governed by the Mitakshara died leaving a widow and a daughter surviving her. The widow's right to succeed was disputed by the widows, of his predeceased brothers and by the plaintiff Kanhailal, his sister's son who claimed to have been adopted by one of these widows to her deceased husband. In 1892 a compromise to which all the four ladies and the plaintiff were parties, was made under which all the ladies took each a fourth of the estate. The plaintiff took nothing immediately, but his adoption and his right to succeed to his mother were recognized, whose share he later on acquired by relinquishment. Then A's daughter died leaving a daughter of her own. Later still A's daughter died leaving a daughter of her own, and later still A's widow died. The plaintiff and his brother Ramsarup claimed as next reversioners the whole of A's property allotted to the three ladies other than his own mother by the compromise. His suit was dismissed by the courts in India but he pressed his claim on the ground that his reversionary right could not be the subject of a valid compromise. But their Lordships threw out his appeal holding the plaintiff estopped by his own act in 1892 in inducing the ladies to a compromise in which his mother and by her relinquishment, he himself obtained a fourth of the estate, and secured from them the recognition of his adoption (1)

2456. Analogous law.—Since a reversionary right is a mere contingency it follows that a reversioner cannot sue for a declaration of his contingency that is to say, sue that he would be entitled to succeed the heiress in case he should survive her, a contingency which may never happen and about which the courts will therefore entertain no suit. In one case the presumptive reversioner sued to restrain waste failing which he applied for the declaration of his right as such reversioner, but the Privy Council threw out his suit holding "that it was impossible to predicate at this moment who is the next reversionary heir of the deceased proprietor. If a court of law proceeded to make any declaration of right upon that subject such a declaration would be subject to being rendered valueless by the development of events. It would not after events had developed, be even of authority in regulating or declaring the rights of the present respondents as against any other claimant to the character of reversionary heir. Accordingly, a declaration of right granted at the present stage would appear to be stamped with something in the nature of futility." (2) But though a reversioner is not entitled to establish his own status as a reversioner there is nothing to prevent his establishing his relationship to the last owner if it is challenged. And as will be presently seen he is entitled to restrain waste.

2457. Analogous Law.—The right of the reversioner to restrain waste is not a personal right nor is his suit a personal suit which he is entitled to maintain as the presumptive reversioner. As observed by the Privy Council, "A reversionary heir, although having only those contingent interests which are differentiated little, if at all, from a spes successionis, is recognized by courts of law as having a right to demand that the estate be kept free from waste and free from danger during its enjoyment by the widow or other owner for life. But the reversionary heir thus appealing to the court truly for the conservation and just administration of the property does so in a representative capacity, so that the corpus of the estate may pass unimpaired to those entitled to the reversion... This representation is in law founded upon a different set of considerations from those which would seek to stamp the character of reversionary heir upon one individual. The latter operation attempted during the enjoyment of the life estates would necessarily be premature, and might, as stated, be futile. The former is justified by the considerations of keeping the estate intact for the persons to whom as reversioners it shall ultimately and at the proper time be determined that the estate shall go." (1)

2458. It is thus settled that the reversioners' suit is a representative suit, and even as such it is permitted because the waste committed might otherwise be past remedy, and as regards an improper alienation all evidence might disappear if a suit were only permitted when the succession opened. As the Privy Council observed in another case: "Suits of that kind form a very special class, and have been entertained by the courts ex necessitate rei. It seems however, to their Lordships that if such a suit as that is brought it must be brought by the reversioner with that object, and for that purpose alone, and that the question to be discussed is solely between him and the widow; that he cannot

2459. Waste.—It is not every waste that the reversioner may sue to restrain. As previously remarked, the heiress does not hold the estate in trust for him. She holds it in her own right, subject only to rights of the reversioner. What those rights are have by now become well settled, and the general principle was thus stated by the Privy Council: "It is not sufficient to say that there is one person entitled in possession, and another entitled in remainder, in order to induce the court to interfere to take the property out of the hands of the individual who is in possession of it; but it is necessary to show that there is danger to the property from the mode in which the party in possession is dealing with it, in which case and in such case only, the court will interfere." (2) In an old case Peel, C. J. said: "The Hindu female is rather in the position of an heir taking by descent until a contingency happens . . . Therefore a bill filed by the presumptive heir in succession against the immediate owner who has succeeded by inheritance, must show some case approaching to spoliation, must enable the court to see that there is probable ground for apprehending that unless an injunction be granted to restrain some threatened or a pending act, ultimate loss to the heirs who may come into possession by a succession will ensue. It is not enough to make out that some gift has been made, or some disposition taken place or that such is about to be made or to take place which the law would not support. The estate of the female owner, her own personal estate, might be large and adequate to repay ten times over the alleged spoliation, and there might not be the remotest prospect of loss, and the thing alienated might have no specific peculiar value." (3) So in an old case the Privy Council formulated the following rules as applicable to limited owners:—"That when the husband dies intestate and without issue, the widow is entitled to the absolute possession of the property descended from him, to enjoy it during her life-time, and to dispose of it under certain restriction, that the extent and limit of her power of disposing of the property are not definable in the abstract, but must be left to depend upon the circumstances of the disposition when made, and must be consistent with the law regulating such disposition. That there is no distinction in this respect between the moveable and immoveable property descended." (4)

2460. The term waste as used in this connexion must then be understood to mean spoliation, or such damage as endangers the inheritance. The reversioner has no right to rush into court upon a mere possibility. So where the widow had received Rs.55,466 in the company's 5 percent rupee paper which they redeemed at par, paying to the widow the amount in cash which she retained for about three months awaiting an advantageous investment whereupon the reversioner rushed into court with an allegation that the widow intended to misappropriate the amount upon which the widow denied that the reversioner had any cause of action. The latter however argued that it was an ordinary quia timet suit and the Privy Council held that the mere retention of money did not make the heiress guilty of devastavit or showed the slightest intention of committing waste and that therefore the reversioners suit was rightly thrown out. <sup>(1)</sup> But the case was held to be different where upon acquisition of land the widow withdrew the compensation awarded in respect thereof under the pretence of absolute ownership which she would not have been allowed, if she had disclosed her limited title. The court thereupon ordered her to invest the money as required by S. 32 of the Land Acquisition Act. <sup>(2)</sup> The two classes of cases are distinguishable. She had the right to the money in the one case which she had not in the other. Where she has the right "the general apprehension of danger that, if personal property be entrusted to a Hindu widow there is every probability of its being parted with and if so, it may not be recovered, is an element which cannot be allowed to exist or considered consistently with the views of the Privy Council case last cited. <sup>(3)</sup> The danger must be established not as a matter of probable speculation, but as one of reasonable certainty to the satisfaction of the court. <sup>(4)</sup> It must be remembered that the reversioner is merely entitled to his reversion in whatever state he finds it. The heiress is not the guarantor of its state or condition. As owner she is entitled to make full beneficial use of it, by opening mines and working them <sup>(5)</sup> and tapping other new sources of income. She is not to be deterred from any compassionate regard to the rights of her successor from making full use of her property. Nor can the successor complain of its deterioration as waste or its exhaustion as a danger to his reversion, since both these contingencies are fully consistent with the prudent exercise of rights of ownership.

2461. Improper alienation.—The reversioner is entitled to restrain the heiress from alienating her property for unauthorised purposes. The reversioner may either restrain her as well as her intended alienee from proceeding with the alienation or if the alienation is made he may obtain a declaration that it was made without legal necessity and was therefore void beyond the heiress life-time. <sup>(6)</sup>

2463. May oppose Probate.—On a similar principle a reversioner has been held entitled to oppose the grant of a probate and he may intervene when he finds the heiress guilty of collusion between herself and her adopted son. So where one S alleging himself to be adopted son of M applied for the probate of the will of his father and the latter's widow had first opposed the application but subsequently withdrew her opposition to probate being granted to S whereupon her daughter K applied for leave to oppose the grant of probate on the ground that her mother had colluded with the applicant which the court granted holding that the daughter was reversioner and her rights would be prejudiced by the grant of a probate without hearing her, as the widow who had at first contested the application had withdrawn her opposition, and there was reason to suspect that she was in collusion with the son. (1)

2464. Administration Suit.—A reversioner is entitled to sue for administration if a dedication of property to which a reversioner is entitled is not valid and the executors proposed to carry out the dedication. Such an act would entitle the reversioner to seek the assistance of the court and have the property properly administered. (2) When a person entitled to an estate in reversion brings a suit against the executors of the estate for administration and subsequent thereto an administration suit is brought by one executor against his co-executors and a consent decree obtained without the reversioner being made a party, such a reversioner will be entitled to bring his suit to a hearing, and upon a second decree being made, the accounts and enquiries already had under the first decree will be adopted in the second decree so far as it can be applied and the reversioner who brought the first suit will be entitled to the conduct of the proceedings. (3)

264. (1) Such suit must be brought in the first instance by the presumptive reversioner, but if owing to Reversioner's suit his minority, collusion, or consent, ratification, waiver of his right as reversioner, estoppel or limitation, he is unable or unwilling without sufficient cause to sue, then it may be brought by the reversioner next to him in succession but in that case the court may join the presumptive reversioner as a party to the suit.

(2) A suit instituted by the presumptive reversioner may on his death, or otherwise on proof of laches or collusion with the heiress whose acts are impugned, be continued by the next presumable reversioner.

(3) Where the immediate reversioner is a female the nearest male reversioner may maintain such suit without having to show any of the causes mentioned in clause (1).

(4) Any adjudication made in such suit is resjudicata as against the heir when the reversion opens.

sioners' equity set out in the last section belongs in the first instance to the presumptive reversioner. He and he alone is entitled to sue. As the Privy Council observed : " Although a suit of this nature may be brought by a contingent reversionary heir, yet that, as a general rule it must be brought by the presumptive reversionary heir, that is to say, by the person who would succeed if the widow were to die at that moment. They are also of opinion that such suit may be brought by a more distant reversioner if those nearer in succession are in collusion with the widow or have precluded themselves from interfering. They consider that the rule laid down in Bhikaji Appaji v. Jaganath Vital <sup>(1)</sup> is correct. It cannot be the law that any one who may have a possibility of succeeding on the death of the widow can maintain a suit of the present nature for, if so, the right to sue would belong to every one in the line of succession, however remote. The right to sue must, in their Lordships' opinion, be limited. If the nearest reversionary heir refuses without sufficient cause, to institute proceedings, or if he has precluded himself by his own act or conduct from suing, or has colluded with the widow or concurred in the act alleged to be wrongful, the next presumable reversioner would be entitled to sue. <sup>(2)</sup> In such a case upon a plaint stating the circumstances under which the more distant reversionary heir claims to sue the court must exercise a judicial discretion in determining whether the remote reversioner is entitled to sue and would probably require the nearest reversioner to be made a party to the suit. <sup>(1)</sup> "Such a suit brought by the presumptive reversioner is in a representative capacity and on behalf of all the reversioners. The act complained of is to their common detriment just as the relief sought is for their common benefit. On the death therefore of the presumptive reversioner, the next presumable reversioner would clearly be entitled to continue the action instituted by the deceased plaintiff unless there is anything in the processual law of India to preclude him from so doing." <sup>(2)</sup> Again, "there is nothing to preclude a remote reversioner from joining or asking to be joined in the action brought by the presumptive reversioner or even obtaining the conduct of the suit on proof of lapses on the part of the plaintiff or collusion between him and the widow or other female whose acts are impugned. It is the common injury to the reversionary rights which entitles the reversioner to sue. Apart therefore from the question whether the next presumable heir is the legal representative of the deceased presumptive reversioner, there remains the outstanding fact of identity of interest on the part of the general body of reversioners, near and remote, to get rid of the transaction which they regard as destructive of their rights." (1)

2466. The right of suit belongs to all reversioners in their order of succession without regard to sex. (2) So the daughter may sue during the life-time of her mother if her reversionary rights are seriously threatened. (3) So where the widow abandoned possession of her husband's estate alleging that her husband was not separate but a member of the joint family, the daughter was entitled to sue and was put in physical possession of the estate as manager during the widow's life-time. (4) So where the daughter was found to have colluded with the widow, the next presumable reversioner was held entitled to sue both. (5) So where the widow and the plaintiff's father jointly made an alienation the son was held entitled to maintain the suit for its cancellation even though his father and not he was the immediate reversioner. (6)

2467. The existence of an immediate female reversioner such as the daughter is no obstacle to the next presumptive male reversioner avoiding an improper alienation, since the one takes only a life estate while the other takes an absolute interest. Moreover as observed in a case "that in the case in which upon the death of a full owner, the estate successively passes through the hands of a series of female heirs who take only a qualified estate before the property vests in another full owner they may rightly be regarded in the aggregate as the holder of a limited interest which intervenes between the full ownership of the original owner and the ultimate taker". (7)

2468. It may be also suggested that since such suit is a representative suit the female owner cannot represent the interest of the male reversioners who have therefore a cause of action of their own which is unaffected by her intervention.

The contrary was laid down in some earlier cases of the Allahabad Court where it was held that apart from collusion or connivance the existence of an intermediate female reversioner was an obstacle to the maintainability of the suit by the next presumptive male reversioner.

But since the suit is a representative suit a reversioner entitled after the death of a tenant for life to a share in the inheritance cannot lay claim to any definite share nor can he sue to set aside a transaction affecting the inheritance so far only as it would affect his probable share. For instance, suppose he is one of 6 reversioners complaining of an adoption. He cannot sue only for his one sixth share and pay court fee thereon alleging that he sues only to the extent of his interest. (8) The reversioner cannot oust the heiress because she denies his title but if she disclaims all interest in the estate, the court may place the reversioner in possession as manager for her life-time. The nearest or any other reversioner must, of course, prove his relationship to the last full owner if it is denied, and unless he proves his own title as reversioner entitled to sue, the defendant cannot be called upon to justify her alienation. (1)

Minority.

2469. The minority of the nearest reversioner justifies a reversioner more remote to maintain such suit. (2)

Collusion and consent.

2470. The question of consent has already been examined before. Connected with it is the question of collusion. Collusion implies that the presumptive reversioner had improperly joined with the heiress in destroying the reversion which enables the remote reversioners to vindicate their rights. (3) So where the immediate reversioner consented to a gift be a widow it did not prevent a remote reversioner from impeaching it. (4)

Ratification.

2471. Ratification is consent given to an act post facto.

The circumstances in which a remoter reversioner may maintain a suit have been stated in the section. But a question arises how is he to satisfy the court that the presumptive reversioner was unable or unwilling to sue.

Where such reversioner has joined in the alienation it is not difficult to prove his complicity. But in other cases it is apprehended that this fact need not be proved with the accuracy of a plea. It will suffice if there is a verified declaration against the presumptive reversioner who is impleaded as a party defendant. It will then be obvious whether he is interested in upholding the suit or opposing it if a remote reversioner sues without joining the nearest reversioner (5) or proving why the nearest reversioner is precluded from maintaining the suit (6) his suit is liable to be dismissed. (7)

2472. So would be the suit instituted by the plaintiff as next reversioner when he was merely a remote reversioner and there was no allegation of any collusion and the like against them. (8) In such cases the court may allow an amendment of the plaint if it is not too late and would not alter the nature of the suit. (9)

2473. Not only the actual reversioner who consents to a transfer but his legal representative also is precluded from maintaining a suit for its cancellation, (10) and where several persons join in a conveyance and convey "the whole and entire property absolutely" it must be taken that they have exercised every power which they possess and that they have parted with their whole interest whether in possession or in expectation. Where therefore the widow and the immediate next reversioner made such alienation in favour of a third person, the reversioner would be prevented from afterwards avoiding the transfer. (11)

So a reversioner may ratify a transfer. So where a tenure granted by the widow was recognized after her death by the reversioner who received rent from the holder of the tenure, such receipt was held to amount to ratification of the tenure precluding a suit for setting it aside on the ground of the widow's incompetency. <sup>(1)</sup>

2474. Relief.—The relief admissible in such suit must necessarily depend upon the nature of the claim. If it relates to an adoption it may challenge its factum or validity or both. If to an alienation, it may deny its validity on the ground that it was wholly unsupported by necessity. Where it is so it is open to the court to cancel the alienation altogether. <sup>(2)</sup> If it is partially supported by necessity it is open to the court to declare it valid to that extent and charge the sum upon the property of which it may order payment. <sup>(3)</sup> The uncertainty regarding the person who would be entitled to succeed the widow is no ground for refusing a declaration regarding the character of the alienation and the declaration may be that the alienation is invalid as a whole, but that on equitable ground the alienee should have a charge declared in his favour for the binding portion of the consideration. <sup>(4)</sup> In some cases it has been held that the plaintiff cannot obtain a declaration of the invalidity of an alienation partially supported by legal necessity unless there is an offer in the plaint to reimburse the alienee to the extent the alienation was for necessity. <sup>(5)</sup> But it is submitted that the right of reimbursement is merely an equity which the court awards as a portion of its relief and that it is always open to the court to grant such relief as the plaintiff may be found entitled to. <sup>(6)</sup>

2475. In a reversioner's suit in the life-time of the limited owner the latter When owner ousted. cannot be ejected since whatever may be the effect of her improper alienation, it does not entail forfeiture of her own estate. <sup>(7)</sup> And all that the reversioner is entitled to and can claim is to have his possible interest protected. As such he is not entitled to a remedy more extensive than is requisite to protect his rights. His reversionary interest is not accelerated by an alienation which the heiress may make in fraud of his presumptive right. All that the reversioner is ordinarily entitled to is a declaration that the female owner's act is null and void as far as it may affect the interest of the person entitled as reversioner and if there were danger lest from the nature of the property the corpus should be wasted, the utmost he can claim is a decree for its protection by the appointment of a receiver or by such other means as the court might deem suitable. <sup>(8)</sup> But though this is the rule, cases may arise where her own conduct may lead to her own dispossession. So where the daughter who was entitled to her father's estate acquiesced in the possession of her father's relatives holding them out as the rightful heirs the court awarded her possession but added a clause that if she declined to accept possession the reversioner was to be put into possession as manager of the property on her behalf and that he would then act under the orders and directions of the trial Court filing accounts in and paying the income to her through such court. (1) In another case the order of the court appointing a receiver was upheld by the Privy Council. In that case the property in question a large and valuable zamindari was seized by Government but afterwards restored to the widows of the last holder. Within four years of this restoration the two junior widows sued the senior widow complaining of various acts done to the detriment of their rights and more especially that she had without their consent adopted a son to whom she has transferred the entire estate. The senior widow upheld the adoption and alleged that all the other widows had no right beyond a claim for maintenance. The court found the senior widow's management reckless and her expenditure lavish and that the adopted son could not supersede the widows. But though it held the widows entitled to the estate it refused to remove the manager as they were old and incompetent. The widows appealed but the Privy Council held that it was a matter of discretion with the court as to the removal of the receiver and looking to the case the court had exercised a very sound discretion in not removing him. (2) The courts have in other cases upheld the appointment of a manager in a case of proved waste endangering the reversion. (3) It will not interfere in an attempt at false adoption and the mutation of names in favour of the so called adopted son. (4) As the court remarked, "certain specified acts of misconduct by her operate according to Hindu Law to destroy her estate and to vest the property in the reversionary heirs and according to several decisions the courts also have jurisdiction to interfere to prevent the waste or destruction or the fraudulent alienation of property by her if a sufficient case is made to justify this interference. In such cases the widow has been deprived not of her interest but of all control over the property which has been placed for its preservation in the hands of others (sometimes in the hands of the reversioners themselves) as managers on her behalf." (5)

2476. Decision Res judicata.—Since the reversioner's suit is a representative suit in which he represents fully the whole reversion it follows that a decision given in his suit operates as res judicata against reversioners. (6) This is the logical outcome of "the identity of interest on the part of the general body of reversioners, near and remote, to get rid of the transaction which they regard as destructive of their right." (7) In this view "it is impossible to resist the conclusion that if the right litigated is a common right, and if that litigation has been honestly conducted the other reversioners are affected by the law of res judicata. This is a logical result of the decision of the Judicial Committee." (8)

Where an alienation made by the heiress is found to be only partially supported by legal necessity or benefit binding on the reversion, it may, except as otherwise provided, be set aside or upheld in accordance with the following rules :—

Alienation for partial necessity. (1) Where it is mainly supported by legal necessity but only an inconsiderable part is not so supported, the alienation will not be set aside but the alienee, will be bound to make good the amount not supported by legal necessity.

(2) Where the alienation is not mainly supported by legal necessity, the alienation will be set aside on the reversioner refunding to the alienee the consideration he had paid for legal necessity.

(3) Provided that no person not a bona fide alienee for valuable consideration and without notice, can claim such equity to compensation.

2477. Analogous Law.—This section is necessarily subject to other provisions. For instance the reversioner who had consented to the alienation cannot afterwards claim to set it aside. And similarly where the alienee was a privy to the transfer being made without legal necessity he cannot claim the equitable relief by way of restitution. If, however, the alienee is a bona fide transferee without notice and the reversioner has not by his consent or acquiescence encouraged or ratified his transfer, then the rules set out in this section apply. It has no application when the transfer is wholly supported (1) or unsupported by consideration. (2)

2478. But it applies to an excessive sale for necessity and the question whether the sale should be affirmed or its consideration refunded depends upon the excess. As Dwarkanath Mitter, J. said in an old case. "If there were any necessity such as the Hindu Law warranted for a sale of part of the property and the widow sold a larger portion of the estate than was necessary to raise the amount which the law authorized her to raise, it appears to me that the sale would not be absolutely void as against the reversioners and that they could only set it aside upon paying that amount which the widow was entitled to raise with interest." (3) This principle underlies Ss. 65 and 70 of the Contract Act. It is an equitable relief which the court may grant though the reversioner does not offer to make any refund in his pleading. (4)

2479. The principle of this section was considered by the Privy Council in a case in which the widow had sold her heritage for Rs 7,080 due under a decree and interest thereon and a fresh advance of Rs 7280. The first item was proved as supported by no necessity but there was no proof of the second as either paid and if paid, for necessity. The Privy Council held that the sale should be set aside on refund by the reversioner of the sum of Rs 7,080 which alone was supported by necessity. (1)

2480. The principle of this case has guided the courts in the determination of several cases. So where the sale was for Rs. 2,995 out of which Rs. 2,550 was supported by necessity the court decreed possession of the property sold on payment by the vendee of that sum within three months fixed by the court. (2) In another case out of the total consideration of Rs 3291-8-0 Rs 2923-8-0 were found supported by necessity and yet the court decreed conditional cancellation. The same relief was held justified where out of the price of Rs 160- Rs 125 was justified, it being held that "the character of a sale by a limited owner will not be improved by the fact that all but a small proportion of the consideration was intended for a necessary purpose." (3) But there is another possible view. Isn't the limited owner entitled to any discretion at all? And purchasers do not always study the rule of proportions. And as observed: "It would manifestly be impossible and possibly prejudicial to the interest of the estate if the widow were to be held to be bound in every instance to sell property for exactly the sum due to the creditor." (4) So the widow permanently leased a tank for a premium of Rs 174- reserving the annual rent of 8 annas only to pay off the debt of Rs 100- and the court upheld the lease holding it as supported by necessity. (5) Again, proof that the bulk of the alienation was supported by legal necessity may be evidence that the remainder was also presumably so supported. Mere failure to prove any part of the consideration as supported by necessity is not necessarily tantamount to proof that it was unsupported by it.

266. (1) In a suit between the reversioner and the heiress's alienee for possession of property comprised in her estate, it lies on the latter to prove that the former is bound by the transfer to him as supported by legal necessity.

(2) In a suit between a pardanashin heiress and her transferee, it lies on the transferee to prove not only that the deed was executed by, but was explained to and really understood by the former who had executed it by the free and independent exercise of her will.

2481. Analogous Law.—It is a general rule that a transferee from a limited owner must establish that his transfer was competent. As such in a suit between the reversioner and the female heiress's transferee, the former is entitled to succeed by reason of his natural title unless it is displaced by proof of a better one in the transferee. As between the grantor and the grantee the rule is, however, different, since the grantor cannot derogate from his grant.

But the case of pardanashin women is exceptional because a pardanashin naturally labours under a special disability and is therefore entitled to the same special protection which law confers on the weak, the ignorant and the in firm.<sup>(1)</sup> As the Privy Council observed: "The lady was a pardanashin lady, and the law throws around her a special cloak of protection. It demands that the burden of proof shall in such a case rest not with those who attack but those who found upon the deed and the proof must go so far as to show affirmatively and conclusively that the deed was not only executed by, but was explained to, and was really understood, by the grantor. In such cases it must also of course, be established that the deed was not signed under duress but arose from the free and independent will of the grantor. The law as just stated is too well settled to be doubted or upset."<sup>(2)</sup>

2482. Reversioner and limited owner's transferee.—The first clause deals with the burden of proof in a suit between the reversioner and the alienees of the last limited owner. As the reversioner does not claim through or under the limited owner, he is not bound by her recitals and acknowledgement of transfer which have to be proved by the transferees. This he may do in any of the following ways:—

(1) By proof of consent of the then presumptive reversioner raising a presumption of necessity.

(a)—Such consent may be proved by the attestation of the deed by him if it is shown that it was made after it had been read to him.

(b)—It may be proved by subsequent conduct such as ratification or acquiescence.

(2) By independent evidence of payment of consideration and proof of necessity.

(3) By proof that after reasonable enquiries he was satisfied of the necessity.

2483. Pardanashin transferor.—Where, moreover, the transferor is a pardanashin, her transferee has to prove in a suit whether by the grantor or her reversioner, that the transfer was made by her on an intelligent appreciation of its nature and effect and that no advantage was taken of her disability.<sup>(3)</sup>

It is sometimes insisted on that a pardanashin lady must have independent advice but as pointed out by the Privy Council,<sup>(4)</sup> this is not an absolute rule of law. Advice is merely a means to secure that which is essential, an intelligent appreciation of the transaction. It is not the formal execution which so much matters since if they are proved to have understood the deed the fact that they assented to it from behind a screen would not vitiate it for want of due execution as required by S. 59 of the Transfer of Property Act. (1)

267. A suit to avoid an alienation may be brought by the presumptive reversioner within 12 years and by a presumable reversioner within six years from the date thereof.

2484. Analogous Law.—Art. 125 prescribes the period of limitation applicable to the suit of the nearest reversioner, which allows 12 years calculated from the date of alienation. But a remote reversioner must bring this suit within six years under the general article 120 calculated from the same date.<sup>(2)</sup> Of course neither the presumptive nor presumable reversioner is bound to sue the heiress or the alienee during the former's life-time. Their right of suit is a concession made with a view to have the question tried before evidence is lost by lapse of time.

2485. But since the reversioner's suit is a representative suit the cause of a action arises on the date of the alienation, jointly and simultaneously for the entire body of reversioners. If therefore, an alienation by an heiress, is not impeached in a declaratory suit, instituted within the period of 12 years prescribed by Article 125, by the reversioners then in existence, a presumptive reversioner though born after the lapse of 12 years from the date of the alienation will be debarred from bringing a suit for a declaration in respect of it.<sup>(3)</sup> A collusive suit may for the purpose of limitation be treated as a private alienation provided it is the necessary result of some collusive arrangement made by her to use the Court as medium of transfer, or in other words, if she intended to transfer the property and used the Court sale as a means to effect her purpose<sup>(4)</sup> Otherwise, the alienation cannot be held to be made by the heiress within the meaning of Article 125, and the only other article applicable would be Article 120 and not Article 125.

268. An alienation by the heiress in excess of her powers is not void but is voidable at the election of the reversioner.

reversioner who may ratify it or treat it as a nullity. But except as against the reversioner it is valid and cannot be avoided by a third party. <sup>(1)</sup>

2487. Mode of avoidance: Even as regards the reversioner such transfer will only be avoided if it is unsupported by legal necessity and he has not consented to or ratified it. A reversioner is not bound to sue for its cancellation immediately after it is sold. He may wait till the reversion falls it. He is then put upon his election whether to ratify or avoid it. If he elects to treat it as a nullity he may sue the alienee for possession and it is then on the latter to make good his alienation by proving both its factum and validity. <sup>(2)</sup> Even where the reversioner challenges it in a suit of his own, the burden of proof is still on the alienee. He has still to prove that his alienor was justified in making the alienation or that he had after reasonable inquiries ascertained the existence of legal necessity and bona fide believed in its existence. If he proved this his title cannot be shaken even though in fact there was no necessity for as the Privy Council observed: "The lender is bound to inquire into the necessities for the loan, and to satisfy himself as well as he can with reference to the parties with whom he is dealing, that the manager is acting in the particular instance for the benefit of the estate. But they think that if he does so enquire and acts honestly, the real existence of an alleged sufficient and reasonably credited necessity is not a condition precedent to the validity of the charges and they do not think that under such circumstances he is bound to see to the application of the money. It is obvious that the money to be secured on any estate is likely to be obtained on easier terms by a mortgage than by a loan which rests on mere personal security, and that, therefore the mere creation of a charge securing a proper debt cannot be viewed as imprudent management. The purposes for which a loan is wanted are often future and as regards the actual application a lender can rarely have, unless he enters on the management, the means of controlling and rightly directing the actual application. Their Lordships do not think that the bona fide creditor should suffer when he has acted honestly and with caution but is himself deceived" <sup>(3)</sup> These words refer to the powers of the manager of an infant's estate. The heiress is not merely the manager of the estate. She is its owner though her power of alienation may be limited. "Her alienation is not therefore absolutely void but it is prima facie voidable at the election of the reversionary heir. He may think fit to affirm it or he may at his pleasure treat it as a nullity without the intervention of any court and show his election to do the latter by commencing an action to recover possession of the property. There is nothing in fact for the court either to set aside or cancel as a condition precedent to the right of action of the reversionary heir." <sup>(4)</sup>

2488. Who may avoid it.--None but the reversioner is entitled to impeach an alienation made by the heiress, though on her death if there is no reversioner the crown takes the inheritance as the ultima haeres, it has the same right of impeaching an unauthorised alienation. <sup>(5)</sup> The same right belongs to an execution purchaser who has acquired the entire estate and not merely the limited estate of the female owner. (1) As against all but the reversioner her transfer stands good. So where the heiress mortgaged her property which was sold in execution to another who sold it to the plaintiff who sued her transferees for possession whereupon the latter challenged the mortgage as unsupported by necessity the court held that as the defendant was not the reversioner but a mere assignee of the mortgagor's right he could not be permitted to challenge the plaintiff's title. Succession of reversioners

269. (1) On the death of the heiress her limited estate devolves on her next reversioner then alive.

(2) Reversioners take per capita.

(3) Where the next reversioner disclaims the estate it devolves on the reversioner next to him in succession.

Explanation.—The term “death” in clause (1) includes civil death as by remarriage or abandonment of worldly affairs which determines the estate.

2489. Analogous Law.—On death or remarriage of the female heir the estate reverts to the natural line of heirs. Hence the term “reversioners” who are heirs of the last full owner if he had lived up to and died simultaneously with the female owner. (3) If the next reversioner disclaims the inheritance it falls on one who stands next to him in the line of succession. (4) Reversioners take per capita and not per stirpes.

It has already been seen that the succession may be accelerated by the remarriage of the female owner, or her renunciation of worldly affairs (5) or of the estate. (6)

Reversioners' rights on succession.

(1) He is entitled to possession of the estate together with all its accumulations, accretions, and incidents as on the death of the heiress.

(2) He is entitled to dispute all unauthorised acts of the female heir.

(3) He is entitled to represent the estate and as such, may continue the suit instituted by or against the heiress.

2490. Analogous Law.—On the death of the limited owner her reversioner, whether a male or a female, becomes entitled to all the estate of the full owner including all its accumulations, accretions and incidents. As such succession is by descent and not by survivorship, the heir is bound to take out a succession certificate, if any, of the property inherited by him and is subject to Succession Certificate Act. (1)

2491. He is entitled to the estate with all its increments and incidents. So where a widow had mortgaged a shop which she had inherited from her husband without any necessity and the property being destroyed by floods the mortgagee rebuilt it with his own money which he continued to treat as the property mortgaged to him. On the widow's death her reversioner sued for possession while the mortgagee claimed his cost of re-building by way of compensation, but the court decreed possession without compensation holding that the rebuilding of the shop by the mortgagee did not confer on him any higher equity than if it had been rebuilt by the widow. "Had she rebuilt by borrowing the amount it would have been binding on the reversionary estate only if there had been legal necessity for the purpose and the widow had mortgaged the estate therefor." (2) Such a case is indistinguishable from one in which one builds a house upon the land of another. He cannot make him pay for it. For as the Privy Council observed: "It is not in every case in which a man has benefited by the money of another that an obligation to repay the money arises. To raise an equity of that kind there must be an obligation, express or implied, to repay." (3) Such an obligation would be implied if the mortgage had been wholly or even partially for legal necessity. So if the heiress had borrowed money for the purpose of increasing her estate, the reversioner cannot take the acquisition and repudiate the debt. (4) The equity against the reversioner would of course be stronger if he had encouraged the building (5) or the builder had bona fide believed that he was absolutely entitled to the property and improved it by adding to its market value. (6) The building of a costly temple is not such improvement which the reversioner has to pay for. (7)

2492. But in such case the builder will be permitted to remove his embellishments (4) unless he had treated as their owner the heiress in which case he has no equity even to remove them. (1)

2493. He may dispute unauthorised acts.—The reversioner may challenge all unauthorised acts of the widow. For instance he may treat her improper alienation as null and void and enter upon the property ignoring her conveyance. As stated before it will be then on the alienee to make good his title or claim compensation or any other equity to which he may feel entitled.

2494. Her legal representative.—He is entitled to continue as a legal representative all proceedings pending at her death and relating to his estate. (1)

His liabilities. 271. (1) On succession, the reversioner becomes subject to the following liabilities :—

(1) He is bound by all alienations made by the heiress supported by legal necessity or benefit of the estate.

(2) He is liable to pay for the reasonable expenses of her Shradh in proportion to the estate which he has inherited.

(3) He liable to pay all her debts and for her wrongs to the extent provided in the next two following sections.

2496. Analogous Law.—An alienation by an heiress for necessity being authorized by law necessarily binds the reversioner. The reasonable expenses of her Shradh are chargeable on the inheritance in the hands of the reversioner who is liable to contribute a reasonable amount in proportion to the estate inherited by him. (4)

2497. His liability to pay her debts depends upon their nature and necessity. The question was put to the shastris in a case and they replied "Supposing the proprietor's widow, who succeeded him, to have contracted the debts for the payment of rent due to Government or other necessary disbursements to save the estate, or for the purpose of promoting her husband's spiritual welfare, or for the support of the family or for the due execution of any conditions made by her husband, and to have died prior to the liquidation of such debt, the proprietor's heirs, that is, his brother and brother's sons, are bound to discharge the debt. And if the amount was borrowed for the purpose of being appropriated to any other purposes than those specified, such debt must be satisfied by him who becomes possessed of her jewels and other moveable property" (5). Other cases have been decided conformably to this opinion, it being held "that if wives, who, with the consent of their husband assume the management of his family affairs,

2498. Analogous Law.—S. 271 (3) defines the extent of the reversioner's liability to pay the debts of the previous female holder. This section defines the limit of his liability. It is settled that the reversioner is bound by an alienation made by the heiress for legal necessity or benefit. But it is not as well settled whether he is equally bound to pay her debts similarly supported though this would appear to be the case. (2) In Bombay it has been held that they are liable for the unsecured trade debts of the widow incurred for the purpose of a family business (3) but in so holding Sir Lawrence Jenkins, C. J., who delivered the judgment of the Full Bench addressed himself to the general question and was inclined to hold that the reversioner was liable to pay the legal debts of his predecessor. (4) And this is in accord with the view of the Madras Court (5) but the Allahabad Court (6) and some cases of the Calcutta Court (7) have laid down the contrary.

2499. Personal Claim.—Some claims are from their very nature personal to the heiress and any sale made to satisfy them cannot convey any interest beyond that of the limited owner. Such is a claim for rent accrued due after the death of the last full owner (8) or one made in respect of a debt advanced on the personal security of the widow. (9) And though ordinarily a money decree against the heiress does not bind the reversion (10) still where it is a decree in respect of a debt due from the last owner it is a decree passed against the heiress as representing the estate and as such will bind the reversioners. (11) But where the suit is for maintenance, which is a personal obligation binding on the heiress as such, the decree will only affect her own interest. (12) So the mere fact that the debts were incurred by the widow and the reversioner does not necessarily make the decree realizable out of the entire estate since they may have both contracted the debt without representing the estate. 2500. Sale for arrears of Revenue.—The question what interest the purchaser takes on a sale held for arrears of revenue must for its answer depend upon the terms of the revenue law under which the sale is held. So on a sale held under Act XI of 1859 the question arose what interest the purchaser took by his sale. It was contended that the effect of S. 52 was to convey the estate subject to all encumbrances but the court held that reading that section along with S. 13 the sale conveyed the entire estate. <sup>(1)</sup>

273. The reversioner is bound to pay for the tortious acts of the heiress committed for the benefit of the estate.

Wrongs of the heiress

2501. Analogous Law.—Even the wrongs of the heiress committed for the benefit of the estate bind the reversioners. In one case the plaintiff as reversioner sued the widow for possession and mesne profits of certain property wrongly taken possession of by the widow's husband. He obtained a decree and in execution obtained possession of the property but the decree for mesne profits remained unsatisfied which he sought to enforce against her reversioners. It was held that the property of the husband in the hands of the reversioner was liable. <sup>(2)</sup> In another case the widow had taken possession in good faith of certain property from which she was ejected by a suit in which mesne profits were also decreed. The decree-holder sued out execution against the reversioners impleading them as her legal representatives and they were held liable for mesne profits because the widow had acted for the benefit of the estate. <sup>(3)</sup>

274. The reversioners are bound by a decree passed against the heiress personally as representing the estate, unless it is shown that it was a decree obtained by collusion or fraud, or that there had not been a fair trial of the rights in the suit.

Decree against the heiress.

(b) A a widow sues B for a declaration of the invalidity of B's adoption. Afterwards A compromises her claim with B and suffers a decree declaring B's adoption valid. On A's death her daughter C sues B for possession of the estate alleging the invalidity of B's adoption. The question whether the matter as to B's adoption is res judicata depends upon whether the decree in the previous suit had been obtained after a fair contest.

(c) A the mother of the last owner obtains a decree for maintenance against his widow B. In execution she attaches and brings to sale the right, title and interest of B. The seller takes only the widow's estate as the decree was a personal decree against B.

(d) A the creditor of the last owner sues and obtains a decree against the latter's widow B in execution of which he sells the right, title and interest of B. The sale passes the entire estate and not merely B's life estate.

2503. Moreover, it is the general rule now enacted as a part of the statute law that any person against whom a judgment is used as barring the retrial of the same question may show that it had been obtained by fraud or collusion. (3) This is a general safeguard of which the reversioner can equally avail himself of. The rule was so stated by Turner, L. J., in a leading case on the subject (4) in which he said, "Their lordships are of opinion that, unless it could be shown that there had not been a fair trial of the right in that suit, or in other words, unless that decree could have been successfully impeached on some special ground, it would have been an effectual bar to any new suit in the Zillah court by any person claiming in succession to Anga Muttu Natchiar (the widow). For assuming her to be entitled to the zemindari at all, the whole estate would for the time be vested in her, absolutely for some purposes, though in some respects, for a qualified interest and until her death, it could not be ascertained who would be entitled to succeed. The same principle which has prevailed in the courts of this country as to tenants in tail representing the inheritance, would seem to apply to the case of a Hindu widow, and it is obvious that there would be the greatest possible inconvenience in holding that the succeeding heirs were not bound by a decree fairly and properly obtained against the widow." (1) This rule was adhered to in a later case by Lord Romilly who however added that it was the duty of the widow as heiress not only to represent but also to protect the estate, as well in respect of her own as of the reversionary interest. (2) In other words, before the reversioners are held bound it must appear that the character in which the previous holder was sued was such that he represented the entire estate and not only her own limited interest and such she was charged with the double duty of protecting the dual interests—her own and that of her reversioners. In other words, the suit was a representative suit, and not a suit only on matters personal to herself.

The working of these rules in practice may now be examined.

2504. Representative suit.—In the first place then, the suit must be one in which the heiress was arrayed as representing the entire estate. It is not necessary that she should be so described. But what is necessary is that from the subject matter and character of the suit it must appear that she had been so sued. Such is necessarily the suit in which she sues for recovery of the inheritance, (3) or attacks the factum or validity of an adoption which if good, would divest her estate. (4) But on the other hand where the decree for rent of a temporary tenure was obtained against the widow of a tenure-holder as administratrix of her husband's estate, it was held that the description of the widow as administratrix in the decree was not conclusive evidence against the reversionary heir, that the estate in his hands was not bound by the decree and that the decree being in respect of a temporary tenure was personal to the widow and could not therefore be executed against the reversioners. (5) So a decree for rent of the estate in hands of the daughter for the year of her possession is a personal decree. So is the decree for maintenance of a relation not charged on any estate. (6)

2505. Bona fide Litigation.—Secondly the decree must have been obtained on a bona fide litigation between herself and her adversary. There is no bona fide litigation where one person sues to eject the widow and the latter absents herself or admits his claim. In neither case is there anything on record to show that the litigation was bona fide or that any question raised therein was fairly tried. (7) But this should not be treated as a general rule. For it is conceivable that the case may be too righteous to admit of any contest and consequently the mere fact that the heiress did not contest the suit does not suffice to take the suit out of res judicata. It depends upon its own facts. The court has to examine the record, if necessary, to see whether the litigation was bona fide notwithstanding that the heiress did not appear or did not consider it worth her while to contest the suit <sup>(1)</sup>

2506. Fair Trial.—Thirdly the decree must have been obtained on a fair trial of the matters in suit. What is then a fair trial? It is apprehended that all that it means is that the heiress should have prosecuted her case with a reasonable diligence furnishing all available evidence, withholding and suppressing none, and that the record should evidence no collusion or secret compact or compromise presenting to the court an appearance which masks the reality of the case. A fair trial is perfectly consistent with any natural disadvantage from which the heiress may suffer. It is even consistent with a special disadvantage which may impair the force of her pleading. So where the adoptive mother sued her adopted son for a declaration of the invalidity of his adoption on the ground of want of authority from her husband and the court upheld the adoption<sup>(2)</sup> and where in a subsequent suit by her reversioner for ejectment of the son, the latter pleaded res judicata by reason of the previous decision, which the reversioner resisted on the ground that the previous suit was decided on a personal estoppel against the widow and the latter in suing the defendant did not represent the estate but only herself; but both these contentions were overruled by the Privy Council who held that the previous suit had been expressly decided without recourse to the doctrine of estoppel and that as to the second their Lordships held, that “notwithstanding the personal estoppel under which she laboured the widow did represent the estate on the question of fact as to whether the defendant had or had not been validly adopted.” <sup>(3)</sup>

2507. In other words without representing the estate the question of the validity of the defendant's adoption to her husband would be meaningless. It was however conceded that as a litigant she laboured under a personal disadvantage in the previous suit by reason of her own adoption but this did not suffice to remove the bar of res judicata as it could not be said in the language of the leading case that there had not been a “fair trial of the right in that suit.” <sup>(4)</sup> “In the absence of all authority their Lordships cannot decide, that a Hindu lady, otherwise qualified to represent an estate in litigation ceases to be so qualified merely owing to personal disability or disadvantage as a litigant, although the merits are tried and the trial is fair and honest. The principle is that reversioners must risk that, so that there may be an end to litigation.” <sup>(5)</sup>

2508. Another question in this connection arises whether the reversioners are bound by consent decrees passed against the widow. It is said that a Hindu widow who is a limited or qualified owner cannot confess judgment and be party to a consent decree so as to bind the reversioners <sup>(6)</sup> but the decisions of the Privy Council <sup>(1)</sup> have rendered this view no longer tenable ; and the sole test by which the decrees and compromises of limited owners are to be judged is whether they were fair and suffered or made with due regard to the interests of the reversioners. So the mere fact that the heiress did not contest the suit or having contested it, filed an appeal which she afterwards withdrew <sup>(2)</sup> does not render the decree ineffectual against the reversioners.

2509. Heiress represents the estate.—Since the estate vests in the female heir in her own right it follows that she is entitled to represent it in all transactions concerning it. <sup>(3)</sup> Where for instance a suit is pending or a decree passed with reference to the estate she is on the death of the last owner entitled to continue or to defend the proceeding as his legal representative. <sup>(4)</sup> If a decree is executed against the estate of the deceased without joining her as his legal representative, subsequent proceedings do not affect the estate which she has inherited and nothing passes by any sale of the estate made in the proceeding to which she was no party. <sup>(5)</sup>

2510. Since the heiress represents the estate any decree fairly and properly obtained against her in regard to the estate is, in the absence of collusion or fraud binding on the reversionary heir and where merits are tried and the trial is fair and honest, a Hindu lady otherwise qualified to represent the estate in litigation does not cease to be so qualified merely owing to a personal disability or disadvantage as a litigant. <sup>(6)</sup>

2511. A converse case was decided by the same Board in a case in which the reversioners having disputed the daughter's right to succeed, the matter was referred to the arbitrators between the daughter and her son Amrit, then a minor, represented by his father on the one side and the reversioners on the other but before they could decide the parties effected a compromise by which the reversioners were to receive the estate the arbitrators were requested to give and they in fact gave their award in accordance with the compromise which was filed in court and embodied into a decree. On the death of the daughter her son sued the reversioners for possession but the reversioners pleaded the award in bar of his claim which Amrit pleaded was a nullity as secured by fraud during his minority and when he was not properly represented. The High Court overruled his contention, but on appeal the Privy Council reversed the High Court holding that Amrit had merely a spes successionis, during the life time of his mother and it could not be the subject of any contract or compromise. The action of Amrit's father therefore in referring to the arbitration any matter connected with his son's reversionary interest was null and void. Moreover the compromise was not beneficial to the minor and therefore not binding on him. The decree following the award did not determine or affect his reversionary rights. The minor was not even a party to the proceedings which culminated in the compromise being reduced to a decree. There had not then been a fair trial of the minor's rights in the previous suit and it did not operate as res judicata to his claim. (1)

2512. This was then a case in which there could have been no bona fide litigation and no settlement or compromise. Such was also the case of the widow who sued to recover her husband's estate. After partially examining some of her witnesses she declined to proceed further with their examination and summoned the defendant and on his failure to attend, her suit was dismissed. The widow did not appeal against that order. On her death her daughter's sons sued the same defendant to recover the same property and he pleaded the previous suit as res judicata.

The High Court held that in view of the circumstances disclosed by the facts of the previous disposal, it was obvious that the facts of the previous case should be closely examined to see whether there had been a fair trial. Apparently there was not, because the widow, did not fairly prosecute her case and did not appeal against its closure. She was bound to protect not only her own interest but also the interests of the person who was to take after her death. (2)

2513. Compromise Decree.—Since the decree is to be made on a fair trial of the matter in suit, a question arises and has been considered in several cases whether a compromise decree binds the reversion. It was at one time held that it did not (3) since a compromise was a contract and a decree on a compromise was indistinguishable from an alienation inter vivos which did not bind the reversion. How could it then become (it was said) more binding by the mere fact that it was embodied in a decree. But a compromise decree may still be a fair decree more favourable to the reversion than what a decree might have been if passed on contest. It cannot therefore be asserted as a general rule that no compromise binds the revision. The more correct rule would appear to be that though the reversioner as such cannot ipso facto reject a decree passed on compromise, the question whether he is or is not bound by such a decree depends upon whether it answers the general test. Moreover a compromise may amount to a family settlement and the reversioner will then be bound by it. It is immaterial whether it is called a compromise, for even a compromise is valid if it is a fair settlement of rival claims. It has been so held by the Privy Council (4) in which the reversioner had contended on the strength of the earlier cases that a compromise was indistinguishable from an alienation, but the Privy Council overruled this contention holding the compromise had been made under the advice of the District officer and that as a settlement of the family dispute it bound the reversioners.

2514. These cases have overruled the contrary held by the Indian Courts and settled the rule that a decree passed on a fair compromise will equally bind the reversioners if it is a fair settlement. (1) It is not an alienation or subject to its restrictions. (2)

2515. A compromise out of court stands on the same footing and its validity is subject to the same test, viz., it is valid and would bind the reversioners if it is a compromise made for the benefit of the estate and not for the personal advantage of the heiress. Moreover the reversioner who has taken part in such compromise and benefited himself thereby would be estopped from dispensing its validity. So where the last owner's sister's son A disputed the right of the widow B to inherit her husband's estate but compromised his claim by which the property was immediately divided amongst the widow and other members. A took share under the compromise but he was thereby recognized as the adopted son of another deceased uncle whose widow had taken a share and which she some 6 years later surrendered to him. On the death of B four years later A and his brother claimed the entire property as reversioners, but the Privy Council threw out A's claim holding that A having entered into and taken the benefit of the compromise was precluded from claiming as reversioner. (3)

2516. Decree against her personally.—Again since the heiress alone represents the estate it has been held that in order to operate as res judicata the decree should have been passed personally against her as representing the estate and not against any of the representatives. So where the widow executed a mortgage on foot of which the mortgagee sued and obtained a decree against her. She preferred an appeal but while her appeal was pending she died and the appeal was continued not by the reversioners but by the widow's personal representatives. It was dismissed and the mortgagee obtained possession. The reversioner sued him for possession challenging his mortgage as fraudulent and without legal necessity. His suit having failed, he sued him again for redemption on the ground that he was not bound by any proceedings continued since the death of the widow and this contention was upheld by the High Court who held that since the decree of the Trial Judge merged in that of the court of appeal and since that court had passed a decree against the widow's personal representatives who could not represent the estate, there was no decree which bound the reversioner, and since there was a valid mortgage as held in the previous suit against the reversioner, the latter was entitled to redeem it. (4)

2517. But though the limited owner's right to compromise a claim is now beyond controversy, it must be a compromise, and not merely an alienation in the guise of a compromise. Every compromise pre-supposes a bona fide claim and if there was no claim there could be no compromise. (5) This is no exception to the rule that a compromise is binding if it is fair and made with due regard to the interests of the reversioners.

2518. When execution sale binds the reversion.—If the decree binds the

Exp. (1) estate so does the sale held in execution of such a decree. But decrees are often passed without specifying the interest affected in which case the question whether on the sale of the right, title and interest, of the widow in execution of a decree, the whole interest or inheritance in the family estate does, or does not pass depends on the nature of the suit in which the execution of the decree takes place. If the suit is on a personal claim against the widow, then merely the widow's limited estate is sold. If on the other hand the suit is against the widow in respect of the family estate, or upon a cause not merely personal against her, then the whole of the inheritance passes by the execution sale. In order to ascertain the quantum of interest affected by the decree it is permissible to examine the judgment upon which the decree is passed (1). So where the plaintiff sued for and obtained a decree for her maintenance against the widow in execution of which she attached whatever right and interest the judgment debtor had in the estates, the Court held it to be a personal decree and as such one which in execution sale conveyed only the life-interest of the widow. "The real question is what was liable to be sold under the decree, and what in fact was sold. The purchaser may have made a mistake. He may have thought that the Court was selling something which they did not sell, but he was informed distinctly by the notification that the Court was selling the interest of the defendant in the estate, and that besides that interest no other interest was being sold... It appears therefore to their Lordships that what was intended to be sold was the widow's interest only and not the absolute estate." (2) But the mere fact that the proclamation advertised for sale the right, title and interest of the heiress is not conclusive since it is still a question for enquiry, what that interest is and in many cases although the right, title and interest of the widow had been sold the whole interest in the estate was held to have passed and the reversionary heir to be bound by it. (3)

2519. The question in such cases depends as already stated upon the nature of the suit. As Sir Lawrence C. J said, "Now the cases make it clear that the courts in determining the effect of an execution sale look to the substance of the whole matter and have declined to hold themselves fettered by any incorrect description, or by any informality in procedure which can have no practical influence on the result. And so it has constantly happened that where justice and equity require such a determination it has been held that a greater or other interest in the property has passed than would be warranted by a strict adherence to the words of the sale notification or certificate in execution proceedings. Similarly, the whole estate of a deceased debtor has been held to be bound by proceedings in execution of a money decree though the actual heirs were not in so many words bound by the decree; but were substantially represented in the suit. And one can well understand how the courts, and more particularly the Privy Council, have declined to apply the more rigid test of English practice to proceedings in this country." (4)

(4) Deoji v. Shambhu, 24 B. 135 (189).

So where the decree was passed against the widow, in respect of rent of the estate due for a period when her husband was alive, the court held the sale to convey the absolute estate and not merely the interest of the widow against whom the decree was passed.

2520. In some cases the widow was held even to have sufficiently represented her minor sons living, who were held bound by the decree passed against her, unless they could show that the decree was not binding on the estate in their hands by reason of the debt not being one for which the estate was liable. (1)

The matters for consideration in such cases are :—

(1) What property could have been brought to sale in a properly constituted suit ;

(2) What property was it actually intended to sell and buy ; and

(3) Has there been such an error in the constitution of the suit or the conduct of the proceedings that effect cannot properly be given to the intention or, to state conversely, has there been a substantial representation of those interested in the property intended to be sold and bought ? (2)

2521. Personal decree.—The explanation 2 merely states the rule of construction, viz that the nature of the decree must be determined by the nature of the cause of action. If it was personal to the widow, so is the decree. If it affected the entire estate, so does the decree. If the cause of action was personal the fact that the decree was passed both against the heiress and her reversioners would not make the entire estate liable. (3)

275. The reversioner is entitled to sue for possession of immoveable property to which he becomes entitled on the death of a female owner at any time within 12 years from her death as provided in Art. 141 of the Limitation Act ; or in case of its forfeiture, within the same period calculated from when the forfeiture is incurred as provided in Art 143 of the Limitation Act.

(2) Where, however, the property to be recovered is moveable he must sue within six years from the same event under Art. 120 of the Limitation Act.

(3) Provided that where the heiress had at any time set up an adverse title against the reversioner his claim will be barred by her adverse possession for 12 years.

2522. Analogous Law.—The starting point of limitation for recovery of the estate is, since the Limitation Act of 1871, the death of the heiress prior to which possession adverse to the heiress was held to constitute possession equally adverse to the reversioner. And if adverse possession commenced against the former it was held to continue to run as such against the latter. <sup>(1)</sup> In other words under the Limitation Act XIV of 1858 the starting point of adverse possession was its commencement against the heiress and its starting point under the later Acts has been her death. <sup>(2)</sup>

It is settled by the Privy Council that as regards moveables the reversioner's suit for possession is subject to Art. 120. <sup>(3)</sup>

This is the normal case where the widow does not set up any adverse title on her own account. Where, however, she does so, limitation commences to run as from the date of her assertion of such title and the reversioner would then be barred unless he sues for possession within 12 years from that date as provided in Art. 144 of the Limitation Act. <sup>(4)</sup>

2523. Reversioner's suit for possession.—The reversioner's suit for possession is subject to Art. 141 of the Limitation Act whether the reversioner be a male or female <sup>(5)</sup> and whatever may be the number of intervening female estates. <sup>(6)</sup>

The starting point for limitation being unalterably fixed from the date of the heiress' death her alienations whether purporting to be for life or absolute are immaterial. <sup>(7)</sup> So it is said, is the fact of her adoption and the possession of the adopted son. <sup>(8)</sup> Where however the heiress has forfeited her estate by reason of her remarriage the period of limitation is the same though it commences to run as from the date of her remarriage when the forfeiture is incurred as provided in Art. 143. <sup>(9)</sup>

2524. Suit for moveables.—The only article applicable for recovery of moveables is Art. 120 which allows 6 years from the death of the heiress. Such a suit is not a suit for a distributive share of property to which Art. 123 could apply nor a suit for specific moveable property wrongfully taken which is subject to Art. 49. <sup>(10)</sup>

CHAPTER XXVI.

STRIDHAN.

2525. Topical Introduction.—The rights of women in Europe have developed as time progressed, but the rights of women here have become similarly curtailed. This tendency is noticed by Sir Henry Maine who wrote: "The settled property of a married woman, incapable of alienation by her husband, is well known to the Hindus under the name of Stridhan. It is certainly a remarkable fact that the institution seems to have been developed among the Hindus at a period relatively much earlier than among the Romans but instead of being matured and improved as it was in the Western Society, there is reason to think that in the East, under various influences which may partly be traced, it has gradually been reduced to dimensions and importance far inferior to those which at one time belonged to it.....Among the Aryan communities as a whole, we find the earliest traces of the separate property of a woman in the widely diffused ancient institution known as the bride-price. Part of this price which was paid by the bridegroom either at the wedding or the day after it, went to the bride's father as compensation for the patriarchal or family authority which was transferred to the husband but another part went to the bride herself, and was very generally enjoyed by her separately and kept apart from her husband's property. It further appears that under a certain number of Aryan customs the proprietary rights of other kinds which women slowly acquired were assimilated to their rights in their portion probably as being the only existing type of woman's property." (1)

2526. But with the impact of Western civilization there is again a tendency towards the education and emancipation of women. In the Vedic age when marriage was generally a love union between adults women possessed individual rights. The Vedic text quoted by Baudhyayan which later writers reiterated as establishing women's dependence was probably an interpolation and it is so considered by West, J., in a considered judgment in the course of which he said: "In the dim twilight of the early Vedic period, it is possible to discern some indications of a theory of perfect equality once subsisting between the parties to a marriage. The indications are by no means uniform, but the prevailing notion appears to have been that of a free choice of her husband by the damsel, who was even dowered by the father. The married couple were conjoined to pass their lives in union and content. Yet by the time of the actual composition of the Vedas a text could be introduced which according to the interpretation of Baudhyayan<sup>(2)</sup> and Apastamb<sup>(3)</sup> declared that "women are not entitled to use the sacred texts or to inherit." Thus the traces of generous respect were partly lost in the overgrowth of another stage in the national existence, and by the time when the Code of Manu was drawn up, the sex had fallen to a distinctly lower position. A woman is never to seek independence, no religious rite is allowed to her apart from her husband; she must revere him as a god.<sup>(4)</sup> To the same set of doctrines must be assigned such texts <sup>(1)</sup> which taken without the gloss of Kalluk Bhat "exclude wives and daughters from the line of inheritance." <sup>(2)</sup> It is thus possible to trace throughout the principal sources of Hindu Law two entirely different, if not inconsistent lines of thought on the subject of the position and legal capacities of women.

2528. This is also the theory of the Mitakshara which, however, includes all property inherited by a woman in her stridhan. In the same chapter <sup>(6)</sup> it had been previously arrived, through an elaborate course of argument, at the conclusion that a widow takes the whole estate of her deceased husband separated in interest from his brethren. It makes no distinction between inheritance of a woman from her husband and her inheritance from any other person. The right which it thus confers on her is balanced by a corresponding right which it allows to the husband and his sapindas. Thus inheritance from a member of her own family, which on a woman's death, would according to the Bengal school, revert to the next heirs of him from whom she inherited and which according to the Mayukh would go to her heirs as though she had been a male, is assigned by Vijyaneshwar to her daughters, her sons, and after them to her husband and his sapindas. The two rules spring from the same source, a higher conception of a woman's capacity for property, and of her complete identification by marriage with her husband's family, than the Bengal lawyers would entertain; while the limiting of the widow's rights as an heir to the case of her husband's having been separated in interest from his brethren harmonises more with the Hindu theory of the united family than the opposite doctrine of her taking his share equally, whether the family have divided or not.

2529. But whatever may have been the genesis of Baudhayan's text and the curtailment of women's rights the fact remains that women had no rights in the mediæval epoch, being classed with slaves and cattle and it is only in a comparatively later age that their rights became once more recognized and the Smritikars began to concede to them limited rights. There appears to have been some conflict of thought between their rights and their duties. For while on the one hand the woman was assigned an exalted rank by the side of her husband as her better half she was still treated as incompetent to hold and wield property of her own. Apart from their domestic duties their only occupation appears to have been spinning and weaving; and Manu knew of no occasion to speak of women's separate property except in the six-fold gifts which he treated as her sole Stridhan.

2530. This was the stereotyped expression of her rights which later Smritikars reveal with no refreshing comments of their own. Even Yajnavalkya who did much to develop the law of inheritance left women in that strait. His expositor Vijyaneshwar took a bold stand and taking advantage of one loop-hole in his author's description of women's property classed all her estate as Stridhan. But it was an isolated passage and later writers demurred to so astounding an innovation. Jinut Vahan who drove a chariot through his conception of a joint family and modernized the law of property so far as regards man, struggled against the Mitakshara conception of Stridhan of which he laid bare the hollowness.

2531. The law of stridhan is the most difficult as it is the least settled branch of Hindu Law. In its forefront stands its etymological definition by Vijyaneshwar and its repudiation by the Privy Council. The term stridhan literally means "woman's property" and Vijyaneshwar defined it as such. But as has been seen, woman's property is a generic term and embraces property which a woman may acquire by inheritance or partition or it may come to her by gift from her parents, husband or his or her other relations. Yajnavalkya employed the term stridhan to denote the quality of the right in property which she obtained mostly by gift over which she had absolute power of disposal. In describing such property he mentioned that which was obtained by gift from her husband et cetera (adi). Vijyaneshwar seized hold of this word and explained et cetera to include all her other estate howsoever acquired with the result that if his explanation were accepted all that woman acquires by inheritance and partition would fall into the same category as her bridal gifts with the result that they will all be at her absolute disposal and on her death pass to her own heirs. Now as Vijyaneshwar's scheme of woman's rights was limited and followed the earlier conception of her dependance and cautious concession of enjoyment, the Privy Council would not allow the enlargement of her rights as the result of a single text and one wholly out of keeping with the general tenor and purpose of his general scheme. In the very first case which they had to try they repelled the logical deduction pressed upon them. (1)

2532. In later cases (2) they reiterated and strengthened their earlier standpoint with the result that Vijyaneshwar's definition of stridhan stands repudiated and the term stridhan must now be limited to comprise only such property as the woman acquires otherwise than by inheritance and partition and over which she possesses plenary powers of disposal. Leaving out of account then all other property stridhan has but a limited significance. It is a legal concept—a term of art and bears only the meaning assigned to it in S. 278 where all the sources of her acquisition of such property are set out.

2533. This stridhan the owner may dispose of by a gift inter vivos or by will. But it does not mean that the donee or the devisee as the case may be, will acquire all the rights which she had herself possessed in the property since the incapacity of the sex remains and if the donee or the devisee be a woman she will acquire no more than a limited estate, whatever may have been the intention of the grantor. Here again Hindu Law modifies the first rule of conveyancing which holds the transferee to take all that his grantor can give. The same rule obtains in case of inheritance. Take an example. A Hindu widow acquires one village (A) by inheritance and another (B) by adverse possession. If she sells or mortgages both, the vendee whether a male or a female, a relation or a stranger, acquires an absolute estate both in A and B because the transaction is subject to chapters IV and V of the Transfer of Property Act which overrules any rule of Hindu Law to the contrary.

2534. But if instead of mortgaging or selling the two villages suppose she makes a gift of them, then, since the Hindu Law of gifts remains unaffected by the Transfer of Property Act, the interest which her donee takes in the two villages depends upon her personal law. Now since this law only recognizes a limited estate as possible to a woman the sex of the donee will determine the quantum of interest which her deed of gift will convey to the donee. If the latter is a male, he will take an absolute estate. If she is a Hindu female she will take but a limited estate for that is all that Hindu Law permits a woman. If a donee were a non-Hindu woman her estate would not be trammelled by the limitations of Hindu Law, since Hindu Law does not prohibit absolute ownership in a woman but what it does prohibit is that an absolute owner if a female cannot directly convey her absolute estate to another Hindu female by gift or devise. But in such a case she may evade the law by transferring her absolute ownership to a male and then the latter may transfer it as absolutely to the female who was to have been primarily the object of the owner's bounty. In other words she may do indirectly what she cannot do directly.

2535. This is again an anomaly but when law creates artificial barriers, anomalies do creep in and they abound in the law relating to succession, which follows no uniform general rule but depends upon at least five disturbing factors : (1) The kind of stridhan; (2) the fact whether the owner was a maiden or married and if married, (3) whether she had children, (4) or was childless ; (5) even the mode of her marriage ; and (6) lastly, the school to which she is subject. Even in the case of the heirs when they are daughters preference is given to unmarried and indigent daughters over daughters who are married and well off ; while the Bengal law discriminates between daughters who have a son or are likely to beget a son and those who are widowed and sonless.

2536. It might be supposed that in the face of these numerous distinctions it would not be possible to generalize upon the law of succession to stridhan. And the text writers do not attempt it. But if the subject is analysed it will be seen that there is a possibility of reducing these rules to a system.

In the first place though stridhan is acquired in a variety of ways, an examination of the subject will show that all its sources are reducible to two main heads. Stridhan which the older Smritikars describe in detail and which is all they provide for has come to be understood as the technical or proper stridhan. It forms an inconsiderable part of woman's absolute estate. It, however, follows the special rules of devolution upon which there is the greatest conflict. Other stridhan described in clauses 1-6 of S. 278 is subject to a more general rule because it has of only latterly become recognized and its law of succession is not trammelled by any textual directions. It is then possible to formulate the general rules subject to which this description of stridhan passes. Both as regards its enjoyment and the law of its succession it is not a wide departure from the general law. It is, however, natural that the mother's estate should first go to her female issue. As remarked in a case: "The law of succession therefore generally follows the female line."

Sridhan defined

276. (1) Stridhan means woman's property over which she possesses the power of full disposal and which on her death devolves upon her own heirs.

(2) It includes property into which it is converted by sale exchange or otherwise.

Illustrations

(a) A possesses two properties B and C as her stridhan. She makes a gift of B to D and devises C to E. Both the gift and the devise are valid as the properties being A's stridhan, she possessed the absolute power of disposal over them.

(b) A inherits the property B from her husband. She accumulates its income which she bequeathes to C by will. The bequest is void as though A possessed the absolute power of disposal over B's income it was not her stridhan. She could not therefore bequeath it.

2537. Analogous Law.—The following texts bear on the subject of this section.—

Manu:—What was given before the nuptial fire, what was given on the bridal procession, what was given in token of love and was received from a brother, a mother, or a father, are considered as the six fold separate property of a married woman. (1)

Narad:—What was given before the nuptial fire, what was presented in the bridal procession, her husband's donation and what has been given by her brother, mother or father is termed the six-fold property of a woman (2)

Vishnu:—What has been given to a woman by her father, mother, sons, or brothers, what she has received before the sacrificial fire, (at the marriage ceremony) what she received on supercession, what has been given to her by her relatives, her fee (Sulk) (3) and a gift subsequent, are called a stridhan (woman's property). (4)

Katyayan:—Whatever is given at the time of their marriage before the nuptial fire which is the witness of nuptials is denominated by the sages Adhyagnik stridhan. (5)

Apastamb:—Ornaments are the exclusive property of the wife and so is wealth given to her by kinsmen or friends, according to some legislators. (6)

Vyas:—That which is given to bring the bride to the family of her husband is her perquisite which is given as a bribe or the like, that she may cheerfully go to the mansion of her lord (7)

Devala:—Food and vesture, ornaments, perquisites, and wealth received by a woman, from a kinsman, are her own property; she may enjoy it herself, and her husband has no right to it except in extreme distress. If he gives it away on a false consideration, or consume it, he must repay the value to the woman with interest, but he may use the property of his wife to relieve a distressed son. (8)

Yajnavalkya:—What was given (to a woman) by the father, the mother, the husband, or a brother, or received by her before the nuptial fire or presented to her on her husband's marriage to another wife and the rest (Adya) is denominated Stridhan so that it is given by a kindred as well as her marriage-fee (Sulk) and anything bestowed at a marriage. 2538. What is Stridhan.—With the exception of the Mitakshara all texts use the term "Stridhan" to denote the property of a woman over which she has absolute power of disposal. Yajnavalkya uses it in that sense, and illustrates his meaning by enumerating certain well known kinds of that property, adding the word "Adya" i. e. and the like, or et cetera as meaning that his enumeration is merely illustrative and not exhaustive. The author of Mitakshara takes advantage of this incomplete enumeration and explains the word "Adya" to mean all other property acquired by a woman whether by inheritance or partition. It might at first be supposed that Vijyaneshwar an ascetic and expositor of the conservative thought, was striving to enlarge the rights of woman by conferring upon women absolute power of disposal over property even acquired by them by inheritance or partition. But this does not appear to have been his object, though by enlarging the meaning of the term and giving it a wider significance he clearly intended that all such property to descend to the woman's special heirs. This was in itself a serious innovation and was not submitted to by the other commentators and the courts who held that it did not descend in the special line prescribed for Stridhan strictly so called (5) and that in this respect there was no distinction between a woman's property inherited from a male and that which she inherited from a female, (6) and that on this point there is no distinction between the Mitakshara and the Mayukh (7) or the Bengal laws. (8) In other words property acquired by inheritance and partition (9) by a woman is not her Stridhan and Vijyaneshwar is not to be followed when he defines Stridhan as including such property. (10)

2539. Ignoring then the wider definition of the term "Stridhan" contained in the Mitakshara as incorrect, there remains its original connotation and in that sense, the term has now come to be recognized and will be used throughout in this chapter. Stridhan is sometimes spoken of and defined as property of a woman over which she possesses the unfettered power of disposal. But all property over which she possesses such power is not necessarily her Stridhan. For example she possesses an absolute power of disposal over the income of her inherited estate; but it is not her Stridhan because on her death it devolves upon the heir of the last owner and not on her own Stridhan heir. Only such property over which she exercises uncontrolled dominion when alive and which on her death devolves on her own heirs is her stridhan.<sup>(1)</sup> On the other hand a sister in Bombay inheriting to her brother takes his property as her Stridhan, because she has an absolute power of disposal over it during her life time and on her death it devolves upon her own heirs namely her own daughters.<sup>(2)</sup>

What property is stridhan. 277. The following property constitutes a woman's stridhan :—

(1) Property inherited by female heirs born in the family and subject to Mayukh.

(2) Property acquired by grant, gift, or devise from a relation or a stranger which confers an absolute power of disposal.

(3) Property given for the purpose, or in lieu of maintenance, not being property allotted on partition to a wife or widow.

(4) Accretions to and purchases made out of such property.

(5) Property acquired by adverse possession.

(6) Property acquired by self exertion.

(7) Wedding gift and more particularly the following:—

(i) Yatuk including—

(a) Adhyagnik Stridhan—gifts made before the nuptial fire, i.e. at the, actual marriage ceremony, and

(b) Adhyarahnik Stridhan—gifts received at the time of the marriage procession.

(ii) Sulk—or gratuity.

(8) Adhivednik—or the compensation given by the husband to his wife on his marrying another wife.

(9) Anwadeyik—or gifts made after marriage by her relations or by her husband's relations.

2540. Analogous Law.—All the clauses of this section are drawn from the decided cases. <sup>(1)</sup> Of the 9 clauses. Clauses 7-9 alone are referred to in the texts cited under the last section as constituting Stridhan, but as the Court remarked "we are not prepared to hold that the rules of Hindu Law are so inelastic as to be capable of application only to each description of interests in the property as formed the subject-matter of transactions at the time when the rules were first formulated. Indeed, if the rules of Hindu Law were so narrowly construed and applied it would be impossible to administer them because in any case, the courts would be called upon to hold a preliminary enquiry as to when a particular rule was first laid down and also as to what kinds of interest in property were recognized at that time" <sup>(2)</sup> Moreover, the six-fold description of property was never intended to be exhaustive.

2541. The rest are generally described or necessarily implied. The woman's stridhan was formerly the battle ground for interminable logomachies and being a topic on which according to Kamlakar "the lawyers fight tooth and nail" <sup>(2)</sup> and Jimut Vahan himself was glad to close the subject with these words: "Thus has been explained the most difficult subject of succession to a childless woman's stridhan." <sup>(4)</sup>

2542. Bombay females :—It is now settled that females outside Bombay, to whatever school subject, do not acquire an absolute estate in property inherited by them whether from a male or a female, or obtained on partition. (§2324) But as has been seen before, in Bombay female relations born in the family take an absolute estate and the property so inherited devolves upon their own heirs. It is, therefore, their Stridhan. (§2340)

2543. Grant and gift.—It is now settled that a grant or gift to the wife made by the husband or any of his or her relations conferring upon her an absolute power of disposal is her stridhan. This is in accordance with the recognised texts:—

Narad :—What has been given by an affectionate husband to his wife, she may consume as she pleases when he is dead, or may give away excepting immoveable property.

Yyas :—What has been given to a woman by her husband she may consume as she pleases. (1)

Her power over moveables being thus admitted, the question arises whether the texts control her power of disposal over immoveables. It has been held that her power in this respect is subject only to the general law that whatever is absolutely given to the wife by the husband, whether moveable or immoveable, is equally at her disposal by gift or devise at her discretion (2) and that the same rule applies to property acquired by her by grants and gifts from any other relation, such as her father (3) mother (4) son (5) brother (6) husband's father's sister's son (7) or a complete stranger. (8) such as the Government (9).

2544. Property granted or gifted to a woman by her husband or his or her own relations is called Stridayik (10) over which she possesses unfettered power of disposal by gift or devise even during coverture as will be presently seen. (11).

2545. It has been seen before, that any property acquired by deed or devise, that is to say otherwise than by inheritance or partition, (12) may be stridhan if it is taken absolutely. (13) Such was held to be the case of an Oudh Taluqdar whose estate had been confiscated in 1858 by the British Government by virtue of Lord Canning's proclamation. The estate belonged to one Rai Charan Singh and at the time of its confiscation it was in the possession of his junior widow Kublas Kuar upon whom the Government finally conferred it by a Sanad which declared that in the event of her dying intestate, the estate should descend to the nearest male heir, according to the rule of primogeniture and that all her successors should have full power to alienate the estate. On the question arising whether the estate became Kublas' stridhan descendible to her own heirs, the Privy Council held that the Sanad was a fresh grant and had made Kublas an absolute owner of the estate. They added: "If the interest which Kublas, as the widow of her deceased husband originally took in the property had remained unaltered, she would have had no power of alienation either in her lifetime or by will. The estate would have descended to the heirs of her husband, and not to her heirs; but her interest as widow and that of the reversionary heirs were absolutely destroyed and put an end to by the confiscation under Lord Canning's proclamation, by which it was declared that 'the whole proprietary right in the soil is confiscated to the British Government, which will dispose of that right in such manner as to it may seem fitting.' In disposing of that right by the Sanad, the Government granted to Kublas and her heirs male, according to the law of primogeniture the full proprietary right and title to the estate." (1) It was contended that upon acquisition Kublas become a trustee for those who would have been entitled to it if it had not been confiscated, to which their Lordships replied: "To hold that such a trust arose would reduce to a nullity the confiscation and disposal by the Government of the property confiscated. The power of alienation by sale, mortgage or gift, or bequest was wholly inconsistent with an intention on the part of Government to create a trust for the benefit of the reversionary heirs of her husband." (2) In another case the land in dispute formed part of the emoluments attached to the office of Mantem in a Government village. The husband was the mantem but was dismissed for embezzlement and his wife appointed in his place. On her death the question arose whether her daughter or her husband was the preferential heir. In other words, was the property her stridhan or not. It was held that inasmuch as the land had been granted to her by Government it become her own earnings or was a gift from a stranger and as such became her stridhan descendible to her own daughter in preference to the husband. (3)

2546. Where the husband during his lifetime always represented that certain immoveable property belonged to his wife it was held that purchasers from her could not be equitably turned out of the property in favour of his heirs, since his heirs would be as much bound by the representations of the owner as the owner himself. (4)

2547. Property given for maintenance.—Property given for the purpose or in lieu of maintenance (5) not being property allotted on partition to a wife or widow (6) is stridhan. So Devalla cited in the Dayabhag says, "Her sustenance, her ornaments, her perquisite, and her gains, are the separate property of a woman." (7) In this view arrears of maintenance due to a widow at her death do not revert to the estate from which they were to be derived, on the ground that they were not separated from the corpus of that estate during her life. (8) So property purchased by a widow out of her maintenance is her absolute property. (9)

So where a sum of money was given to a widow without restriction in lieu of maintenance by her deceased husband's family it was held that it became her stridhan which she was competent to dispose of inter vivos or by will. (10) Maintenance is a personal right and all arrears due to a woman on account of maintenance constitute her stridhan. (11)

Property which comes from a father to a daughter before her marriage under a testamentary devise is her stridhan according to the text of Katyayan. "That which has been given to her by her kindred goes on failure of kindred to her husband." (1)

2548. Accretions made to Stridhan themselves become Stridhan. (2) One Cl. (4) Accretions and Purchases. Autar Singh had purchased a Darpatni mahal in the name of his wife, whom he declared to be its owner. In several suits relating to the estate he made similar averments. The wife sold the estate to another whom Autar's adopted son sued to eject. Autar's widow pleaded a gift of the estate to her by her husband which was not proved. It was falsely recited in her sale-deed that the consideration of Rs. 3,200 was her stridhan but it was found that she was poor and had no money of her own. The purchaser had no notice of it whereupon the Privy Council held the plaintiff bound by his father's disclaimer and misrepresentation. They said: "It appears to their Lordships that there was a misrepresentation on the part of the father in allowing the property to be taken by the wife under a deed of sale representing that the purchase money was her stridhan and in all his acts both public and private during his life-time representing that the property was his wife's. After the representation on the part of the father his heirs were no more entitled to recover than the father who had been in his life-time . . . And it appears to their Lordships that the minor claiming by descent from the father is equally bound by those representations and that he cannot, as heir to his father, set up that that property belonged to the father when the father could not in his own life-time under similar circumstances have set up that the property belonged to him." (3) In another case the wife had received money presents from her husband from time to time and on his death partly out of such property and partly from other funds raised by the pledge of jewels admitted to be her stridhan, the wife purchased an estate which she devised to the defendants whom her reversioner sued to eject. The defence was that the defendant's alienor had acquired the estate by her own exertions and was therefore her stridhan. All the courts upheld the defence and the contrary contended for was disposed of by the Privy Council in the following words. "It is suggested that where the funds are shown to have come wholly or in part from the husband and to have been afterwards invested in land by his widow, the same law which governs the devolution of immoveable estate derived from the husband is to govern that acquisition, but their Lordships cannot find any trace of authority to support such a distinction. It is clearly the law that from the time the funds were given to the widow by the husband they became her stridhan and that she had full power of disposition over them. Years after the death of the husband she chooses to invest them in land. Can it be contended with any plausibility that that was land which was derived from the husband. Their Lordships can see no ground for establishing this subtle distinction, or for thus arbitrarily interfering with the power of investment and application and disposition which the general law gives to a Hindu female over her stridhan." (4) These last words are significant. They were used with reference to the plea of perpetual dependance of women and the restraint upon her power of alienation analogous to that imposed upon a Hindu father by his sons (1), for which in the opinion of their Lordships there was no justification as a Hindu woman was as regards her own property, subject only to the general law.

The subject has already been examined in the preceding discussion.

2549. Adverse possession.—The acquisition of title by adverse possession is the creature of law which is independent of Hindu law.

Cl. (5) The title so acquired is absolute without reference to the sex of the acquirer.<sup>(2)</sup> A female may acquire a complete title against all comers including her own reversioners. But in such case the ordinary presumption would be against her though it is open to her legal representatives to show that her animus possidendi was adverse.<sup>(3)</sup> The fact that she obtains possession to the exclusion of the rightful heirs would make her possession prima facie adverse unless it is otherwise explained away or accounted for. So where of two joint brothers A and B, A died leaving a widow C and a fortnight latter B died leaving his mother D as his sole heir, C however took possession of the estate as against the mother and continued in possession for 12 years, it was held that C's possession was adverse to D and that on the expiry of the statutory period the estate became her stridhan descendible to her own heirs.<sup>(4)</sup> So where on the death of the father-in-law his daughter-in-law being the wife of his predeceased son assumed possession to the exclusion of his grandson and his wife, her possession was held to be adverse to reversioners who on her death could not lay claim to her estate.<sup>(5)</sup>

2550. It was contended in this case that a property acquired by a female by adverse possession is not her stridhan but the court had no difficulty in overruling this contention by reference to precedents apart from which reference to S. 28 combined with Art. 144 of the Limitation Act is a sufficient answer.

2551. Acquisition by self-exertion.—The prototype of this clause is Katyayan's text cited in the Dayabhag.<sup>(6)</sup>

Katyayan :—The wealth which is earned by the mechanical arts or which is received through affection from any other (but the kindred is always subject to her husband's dominion) The rest is pronounced to be the woman's property.

Dayabhag explains the mechanical arts to mean "spinning and weaving" which was the only occupation of women when the texts were composed. The woman being regarded as the chattel of her lord all her exertions went to his benefit. But the text does not say so. It merely exempts from stridhan the product of mechanical labour pronouncing the "rest to be the women's property." All product of her individual skill and industry will, therefore, constitute her stridhan. So where the wife had acquired her husband's office and its emoluments since enfranchised, it was held that the land became her stridhan which she may dispose of at her discretion, and which on her death devolves on her heirs.<sup>(7)</sup> So whatever is acquired with profits earned by both husband and wife in a joint trade is their joint property, and on the death of the wife, her heirs are entitled to inherit her share.<sup>(8)</sup>

2552. Yautak.—Clauses 6 to 8 deal with stridhan specifically mentioned in the old texts and which is, therefore, sometimes called technical or proper stridhan all else being non-technical or improper stridhan. This stridhan is, generally speaking: wedding gifts, though the classical writers discriminate and describe it with particular minuteness. Of these Yautak <sup>(1)</sup> and its anaologue Ayautak are thus described:

Manu:—Property given to the mother on marriage (Yautak) is the share of her unmarried daughter. (2)

Dayabhag:—(citing the last) Here Yautak signified property given at a marriage, the word Yut derived from the verb Yu to 'mingle' imports "mingling" and "mingling" is the union of men and women as one person and that is accomplished by marriage. For a passage of the scripture expresses—"She becomes identified with his bones, flesh with flesh, skin with skin." (3) Therefore what has been received at the time of the marriage is denominated Yautak. (4)

Smṛiti Chandrika:—Yautak is wealth given by any one to the bride and bridegroom while seated together at a marriage or the like. It is said in the Nighantu [dictionary] that the word Yautak is derived from being then joined together [Yut]. The meaning is, that wealth given to the bride and bridegroom is denominated Yautak, the term Yautak deriving its origin from Yut (mingling). (5)

Ayautak:—Dayakram Sangrah:—The order of succession requisite to be observed in regard to women's peculiar property generally whether Yautak or 'Ayautak' on a failure of heirs including all yet enumerated will be hereafter declared. But at first we treat of the order of succession in regard to wealth not received by women at the time of nuptial termed "Ayautak." (6)

2553. The gift is Ayautak if made after the marriage though in fulfilment of a promise made at the marriage since Ayautak refers to the time when the gift is made and not to the time when it is promised. (7) The burden of proving that property purchased by a woman long after her marriage was yautak property because the purchase was made from a special fund obtained during, her nuptial ceremony is on the person who asserts it. (8)

2554. Gifts are further subdivided into (a) Adhyagnik or gifts made before the nuptial fire, i.e., at the actual-marriage ceremony. (9) and (b) into Adhyavahnik or gifts at the time of the marriage procession, or at a time during the continuance of the marriage rites before or after the crucial ceremony of marriage. "Given before the nuptial fire" is, however, only a term to signify all gifts made during the continuance of the marriage ceremony. (10) So the pandits opined in a case. (11) "A gift of ornaments or other effects to a woman of any one of the four classes at the time of her marriage by a member of the family, either of a husband or her parents or by a stranger is by law termed Adhyagni stridhan, or in other words, the woman's peculiar property bestowed before the nuptial fire. It becomes her exclusive property and the husband's mother or other persons have no right to share it with her. (1)

2556. Sulk (Gratuity).—The term "Sulk" is explained in the Mitakshara as gratuity for the receipt of which a girl is given in marriage. (2) Sulk was originally the bride price received by the father on the marriage of his daughter but as the property over children ceased Kanyadan or the gift of a daughter was exalted to a virtue. The price was still received but treated as the wife's dowry. Virmitrodayi cites Vyas who describes it as "what is given to bring to her husband's house is called the fee or sulk." (3) Evidently the sulk differed according to the needs of the wife and the means of the husband. So we have the following description of it by Katyayan, "whatever has been received as a price of work on houses, furniture and carriages milking vessels and ornaments is denominated Sulk or a fee." (4) Citing this the Dayabhag explains it as "the price of labour, since its purpose is to engage a labourer" (5) or "what is given by way of bribe or the like to induce her to go to the house of her husband" (6) or rather to induce the father to part with her to go to her husband. Virmitrodai speaking of the Sulk says "both these descriptions of property belonged to the woman for to her alone, they are given". (7)

2556. "Adhyavednik"—Solatium on re-marriage or Adhivedanik is another species of stridhan being compensation given by the husband on his marrying another wife. The Mitakshara explains it as a "gratuity on account of supercession" (8) paid as provided by Yajnavalkya:—

To a woman whose husband marries a second wife let him give an equal sum [as compensation] for the supercession provided no separate property has been bestowed on her but if any had been assigned, let him allot half." (9)

Mitakshara (Citing the last)—She is said to be superseded over whom a marriage is contracted. To a wife so superseded as much should be given on account of the supercession as is expended 'in jewels and ornaments, or the like' for the second marriage provided separate property had not been previously given to her husband or by her father-in-law. But if such property had been already bestowed on her, half the sum expended on the second marriage should be given. So much, therefore should be paid as will make the wealth already conferred on her equal to the prescribed amount of compensation. Such is the meaning. (10)

2557. That Adhivedaik gifts by the husband to the wife on the occasion of his remarriage are not unusual was admitted by the Privy Council who said, "It is not unusual for a husband upon his being about to marry a second wife to make a present to his first wife and if he does so the property so presented becomes her stridhan according to the doctrine above laid down." (11) In that case the question arose with reference to a village measuring 679 bighas 2 biswas which the wife in her evidence stated, had been gifted to her in 1847, by her husband on the eve of his second marriage. There was no actual proof of that fact but the Privy Council thought it not improbable "that the husband when about to marry a second wife, should have stated to his first wife that he would appropriate that part of the property which he had purchased in his own name as a present to her in consideration of his being about to marry the second wife." (1)

The latter had gifted the share to her own daughters in 1878 from which the plaintiff, the son, sued to eject them alleging that the defendant's mother was permitted to hold the share benami for her husband. The Privy Council threw out the suit holding the wife's version more probable and that it constituted the share her stridhan over which she had full disposing power.

2558. Anwadeyak.—Anwadeyik is a post-marital gift made by the husband's relations or by her own, and is comprised in the six fold stridhan specified in the text (2) and is described as follows:—

Dayabhag.—Katyayan defines a gift subsequent. What has been received by a woman from the family of husband at a time posterior to that of marriage is called a gift subsequent, and so is that which is similarly received from the family of her kindred. Whatever is received by a woman after her nuptial either from her husband or from her parents through the affection of the giver. Bhṛigu pronounces to be a gift subsequent (3)

Anwadeyik stridhan may then include property received from the parents (4) or from a brother. (5) It includes all jewels presented to her for ordinary use but not family jewels lent to her for occasional use only. (6)

278. A woman cannot alien or devise her stridhan other than Saudayak during coverture without her husband's consent.

2559. Analogous Law.—The following texts define the term Saudayik:—

Katyayan :— Whatever is obtained by a married woman or damsel from the house of her husband or her father or from her brother or parents is called Saudayik.

Ib.—Having obtained Saudayik wealth woman have independent power over it, because it was given them for maintenance out of affection. The independence of a woman in respect of Saudayik is ever celebrated both as regards sale and gift even in respect of immovables. (7)

Vivad Chintamani :—(Citing the last) The word husband is also connected with "house," the word "Sardha" is an incorrect reading "Brother" is used illustratively. The meaning, therefore, is that what is obtained by a married or unmarried woman from her father or his family or from her husband or his family is called her Saudayik. The allotment for maintenance that follows is an extension of this. The same author thus states her power of disposal over it. (8)

2560. This section may be regarded as laying down an exception to the general rule applicable to all stridhan due to the woman's subjection to her husband during her coverture. (1) Moreover, the general spirit of Hindu law is not to allow women independence as regards disposition of property. In the case of females property or ownership has reference to the right of possession and right of enjoyment. The third element of ownership namely the power or disposition, is not recognised by Hindu lawyers. The right of absolute disposal did not enter into Vijyaneshwara's conception of the essentials of ownership and is a later development.

2561. Husband's right to seize wife's property.—The wife's subjection to her husband is evidenced by a right conferred on the husband to seize the property of his wife in case of extreme necessity as prescribed in the record of the following texts.—

Katyayan :— Neither the husband nor the son, nor the father, nor the brothers can assume the power over a woman's property to take it or bestow it. (2)

Mitakshara :—In a famine, for the preservation of the family or at a time when a religious duty must indispensably be performed, or in illness or "during restraint" or confinement in prison or under corporal penalties, the husband being destitute of other funds and, therefore, taking his wife's property, is not liable to restore it. But if he seize it in any other manner or under other circumstances he must make it good. (3)

2562. The texts on the subject of the husband's right to seize his wife's stridhan are conflicting and those that recognize the rights, are, it is submitted, obsolete. Civil law cannot recognize what criminal law will punish as robbery and the tendency of the courts is to encourage no usurpation of property by appeal to the jus marita.

279. On the death of a maiden, her Succession to Stridhan is inherited by her heirs in the following order :—

- (1) Uterine brothers.
- (2) Mother.
- (3) Father.
- (4) The father's sapindas.
- (5) The mother's sapindas.
- (6) Her own sapindas. (1)

Baudhayan :—The wealth of a deceased damsel, let the uterine brethren themselves take. On failure of them it shall belong to the mother, or if she be dead, to the father. (1)

Mitakshara.—(Citing the last) If a betrothed damsel die, the bridegroom shall take the rings and other presents or the nuptial gifts which had been previously given by him [to the bride] "paying however the charges on both sides," that is clearing or discharging the expense which has been incurred both by the person who gave the damsel and by himself, he may take the residue. But her uterine brothers shall have the ornaments for the head and other gifts, which may have been presented to the maiden by her maternal grandfather [or her paternal uncle] or other relations as well as the property which may have been regularly inherited by her. (2)

2564. Maiden's heirs.—The heirs of a maiden's Stridhan are as stated in the section her uterine brothers, mother, and father and failing them the nearest relations. "It has been held that these relations must mean the father's sapindas, since his sapindas are also the mother's sapindas by virtue of her identity with her husband of half of his body. (3) After the father's sapindas the mother's sapindas and after these her own sapindas take in succession. Thus a sister is preferred to a father's brother's son (4) and a father's mother's sister to a maternal grandmother (5) and a step-mother to a mother's sister." (6)

2565. The following text refers to the subject of this clause.

Mitakshara :—Should a damsel anyhow affianced, die before the completion, of the marriage, what is to be done in that case. The author replies : "If she die [after troth plighted], let the bridegroom take back the gifts which he has presented; paying, however, the charges on both sides." 30 If a betrothed damsel die, the bridegroom shall take the rings and other presents, or the nuptial gratuity which had been previously given by him [to the bride] "paying, however, the charges on both sides" that is, clearing or discharging the expense which has been incurred both by the person who gave the damsel and by himself, he may take the residue. But her uterine brothers shall have the ornaments for the head, and other gifts which may have been presented to the maiden by her maternal grandfather [or her paternal uncle] or the relations, as well as the property, which may have been regularly inherited by her. For Baudhyayan says "The wealth of a deceased damsel, let the uterine brethren themselves take. On failure of them, it shall belong to the mother, or if she be dead, to the father." (7)

The Virmitrodrai contains an elaborate discussion on the subject of succession to maiden's Stridhan, (8) but most of it is of little practical value.

2566. Analogous Law—This section is drawn from the Mitakshara in which this order of succession is set out and explained<sup>(1)</sup> and it will be set out in the sequel under appropriate heads.

2567. Unmarried daughter.—The first heir to a mother's stridhan is her unmarried daughter and she is so declared in the Mitakshara. <sup>(2)</sup>

A question arises and has been raised whether a betrothed daughter is unmarried. The Mitakshara uses the expression Kumari to designate an unmarried daughter and it has been held that reading contextually it means that the daughter must also be unbetrothed.<sup>(3)</sup> But it is submitted that the term "Kumari" means really a virgin and would include a betrothed but unmarried daughter.

2568. Married daughter.—The succession of a married daughter is provided in the following text.

Mitakshara :—Hence if the mother be dead, daughters take her property in the first instance, and here, in the case of competition between married and maiden daughters the unmarried take the succession but on failure of them the unmarried daughter and here again in the case of competition between such as are provided and those who are endowed, the unendowed take the succession first but on failure of them those who are endowed. Thus Gautam says a woman's property goes to her daughter unmarried or unprovided <sup>(4)</sup> or provided as is implied by the connective particle in the text. Unprovided are such as are destitute of wealth or without issue <sup>(5)</sup>

2569. Referring to this text Sir Guru Das Banerjee writes: "I think Vijyaneshwar's meaning is, that the rich daughters whether they have children or not, should all be excluded by the indigent daughters whether they are childless or have children. And I presume that the childless daughters would be preferred, to those having issue, only when the competitors are poor, and their means and circumstances are equal. In the case of daughters who are poor in different degrees no hard and fast rule can be laid down, but a court of justice should take to account the circumstances of each case, and order distribution accordingly. It will be noted that no preference is ordered by the Mitakshara as it is by the Dayabagh, to a daughter who has or is likely to have male issue over a daughter who is barren or a childless widow, <sup>(7)</sup> while in Mithila the distinction between the rich and poor is immaterial. The difference in the three schools is due to the interpretation of the word "Apratishthit" in Gautam's text which has been translated "unprovided for" with wealth by some, and "with children" by other commentators. It is now settled that the former is the Mitakshara and the latter the Dayabagh view. In the first view, however, a minute enquiry into the question of comparative poverty is not called for. When the difference in wealth is marked, the whole property passes to the poorest daughter. (1) Since the distinction is based on a special text which is limited only to the succession amongst daughters inter se it cannot be extended to other female relations, e.g., sisters by analogy. (2) Where several daughters inherit jointly they take as tenants-in-common without any right of survivorship. (3)

2570. As stated in the sequel unchastity and illegitimacy are no bar to succession to Stridhan though being a prostitute the daughter is regarded as neither married or unmarried and therefore take only in default of them. (4) But the contrary has been laid down in Allahabad where it is pointed out that consanguinity and not any theoretical spiritual benefit is the sole rule of succession to Stridhan. (5)

2571. Daughter's daughter.—After the daughters the daughter's daughter take the succession under an express text (6) which further provides : " If there be a multitude of these [grand daughters] children of different mothers and unequal in number, shares should be allotted to them through their mothers, as directed by Gautam. Or the partition may be according to the mother's and a particular distribution may be made in the respective sects. (7) That is, daughter's daughters inherit per Stirpes and not per Capita. (8) Daughters of predeceased daughters do not take anything in competition with daughters though the Mitakshara does not altogether ignore them. "But if there be daughters as well as daughter's daughters a trifle only is to be given to the granddaughters. So Manu declares "Even to the daughters of those daughters something should be given as may seem fit from the assets of their maternal grandmother, on the score of natural affection" (9) But this trifle is not a share and not claimable as such.

2572. Daughter's son.—Yajnavalkya's text contains no provision regarding the rights of a daughter's son and Vijayaneswar expressly mentions him as the next heir and supports his view on a text of Narad's which says : "Let daughters divide the mother's wealth or on failure of daughters their male issue". (10) According to the Smritichandrika the daughter's sons take like daughter's daughters. (11) As such they would take per stirpes. (12)

The question whether a daughter's son would also include an adopted son and if so what would be his share in competition with an Auras son has not yet arisen, but it is submitted that since such succession is solely based upon affinity in which the question of spiritual benefit has no place and since an adoption is more an act of the husband than of the wife an adopted son is no heir to his grandmother's Stridhan. 2573. Son.—The son is next assigned a place in the line of succession both by Yajnavalkya <sup>(1)</sup> and Vijyaneswar. <sup>(2)</sup> The view of the Dayabhag school will be noticed later. The question whether the son here includes also an adopted son has been answered both ways in the decided cases it being held that since the highest Hindu authorities place a son on adoption in the category of an Auras son <sup>(3)</sup> he must be so treated for succession to Stridhan. On the other hand the contrary has been laid down in other cases <sup>(4)</sup> in one of which the Pandits opined "If a man appoints another, his adopted son, that person so adopted stands in relation to him of his son, and offers up his funeral oblations and is heir to his estate, but the person so appointed does not become the adopted son of the adopter's wife nor does he offer funeral oblations to her, nor succeed to her property." <sup>(5)</sup> So in Bombay it has been held that "a son adopted by a widow with her husband's consent will not inherit her property, which will go to her father's brothers." <sup>(6)</sup> Of course a woman cannot adopt a son to herself, and such adoption confers no right of inheritance on the adoptee. <sup>(7)</sup> It has been held that co-heirs inheriting Stridhan take as tenants-in-common, with no rights of survivorship <sup>(8)</sup> because this is a succession to obstructed heritage but the Privy Council point out that this is by no means an infallible test, nor indeed universally true. <sup>(9)</sup>

2574. Grandson.—Failing sons, son's sons inherit <sup>(10)</sup> grandsons by different sons inherit per stripes and not per capita. <sup>(11)</sup> If the adopted son takes a share he will share equally with an Auras son. <sup>(12)</sup>

2575. Husband's nearest sapinda.—On failure of the grandson her husband and other nearest sapindas inherit <sup>(13)</sup> that is to say, the estate devolves as if she had died issueless. <sup>(14)</sup>

281. (1) The stridhan of an issueless woman devolves on her husband if she was married to him in the Brahm form which will be presumed, and failing him to his nearest sapindas in the order of their succession to him.

(2) But if she was married to him in the Asur form (or some other unapproved form) it devolves on her mother, then on her father, and then on the father's or mother's nearest sapinda in the order of their succession to them.

2576. Analogous Law.—The rule here stated is deduced from the following text.

Mitakshara:—If a woman die "without issue" that is having no progeny, in other words having no daughter nor a daughter's daughter, nor daughter's son, nor son, nor son's son, the woman's property as above described shall be taken by her kinsmen namely her husband and the rest as will be (forthwith explained.)

10 The kinsmen have been declared generally to be competent to succeed to a woman's property. The author now distinguishes different heirs according to the diversity of the marriage ceremonies. "The property of a childless woman married in the form denominated Brahm. or any of the four (unblamed modes of marriage) goes to her husband, but if, she have progeny, it will go to her (daughter's) daughter, and in other forms of marriage (as the Asur etc) it goes to her father and mother on failure of her own issue (1)

11. Of a woman dying without issue as before stated and who has become a wife by any of the four modes of marriage denominated Brahm, Daiv, Arsh and Prajapitya, the whole property as before described, belongs in the first place to her husband. On failure of him it goes to her nearest kinsmen (Sapinda) allied by funeral oblations. But in the other forms of marriage called Asur, Gandharb, Rakshash and Paishach, the property of a childless woman goes to her parents, that is to say, her father and mother. The succession devolves first (and the reason has been before explained, (1) on the mother, who is valuably exhibited (first) in the elliptical phrase pitr-gami implying goes (gacheti) to both parents (pitaram), that is to the mother and to the father. On failure of them their next of kin take the succession. (2)

2577. Stridhan of Brahm married woman—It has already been seen

CI (1). that of all the 8 forms of marriage only two forms, the Brahm and the Asur survive (§ 414). The question of stridhan succession then depends upon whether the woman was married in one form or the other. And since law presumes that in the absence of anything appearing to the contrary all marriages are performed in the Brahm form (3) (§ 532) it follows that clause 3 lays down the normal rule of devolution of Stridhan; clause 2 only applies to exceptional cases.

The same presumption applies equally to Shudras if the parties belong to a respectable family. Such a presumption was made in the case of Kamathis who were held to be "an intelligent and respectable section of the Hindu community" (4) and there is no room for any other presumption in the case of non-Hindus such as the Cutchi Memons who follow the Hindu Law without following the Hindu religion (5) though the special rules as to the devolution of Stridhan do not apply to Khoja Mahomedans. (6) "The legal consequences of the classes of marriage, the approved and the disapproved, in relation to inheritance, vary according as their leading characteristics are blameworthy or not and suggest the inference that it is the quality and not the form of the marriage that decides the course of devolution ; where the marriage is approved the husband and his side come in, when disapproved, they do not." (1)

2378. The Asur form of marriage has been already described. Asurs were the aborigines of India before the Aryan settler by whom Asur marriage was regarded as demoniacal. Its leading characteristic is the payment of a price for the purchase of the bride from her father (2) as distinguished from a present made to the bride. (3) In spite of the textual oburgations against it, it is quite commonly practised amongst Hindus of all castes, amongst Brahmins in Bengal (4) as amongst the Brahmins and other high caste residents of western (5) and Southern India where Sir Thomas Strange doubted whether any other form was observed. (6) Many variations of the Asur form have come into vogue and if the question were ever put to the test whether a given marriage was Brahm or Asur it might not always be easy to furnish the answer. What would for example be the class of a Gundharba (7) a Santigrihit (8) of a Katar marriage in which the wife is held to occupy a distinctly inferior position to a married wife. And there are several other marriages which defy classification according to the orthodox view of marriage.

2579. Assuming, however, that all marriages are of the form and class, the wife's stridhan goes to the husband and his nearer sapindas in the order laid down in the Mitakshara with reference to the succession to the property of a male, (9) that is to say, the husband takes the property as his own and is then competent to transmit it to his own heirs as his self-acquired property. It does not go to the wife's parents or relations at all.

2580. It is, however, said that the order of proximity in the case of the husband's sapindas must be in accordance with the following text :—

Brihaspati:—The mother's sisters, the maternal uncle's wife the paternal uncle's wife, the father's sister, the mother-in-law, and the wife of elder brother are pronounced to be similar to mother's. If they have no legitimate offspring of the body, no stepson, nor a daughter's son then the sister's son and the rest take their property. (10)

2581. According to the text of Mitra Misra on failure of these (the inheritance devolves) on the stepson ; his sons and grandsons, because under such circumstances, these offer the natural oblations, and pay the debts, and because it has been ordained in this manner in the above text of Manu. (11) Then on the failure of these, though sapindas, such as a father-in-law, may be living, the sister's son and the rest have a right to inherit, according to the scale of their nearness mentioned in the text of Brihaspati, the property of their mother's sister and the rest, by virtue of the special text (of Brihaspati) which cannot have any other application.

This order not only accords with the text of Brihaspati but also with that given in the Mayukh <sup>(1)</sup> and the Smriti Chandrika <sup>(2)</sup> but being in conflict with that indicated in the Mitakshra, the latter must prevail <sup>(3)</sup> and has been upheld by the Privy Council who held that the co-widow was entitled to succeed to the property of a woman dying without issue, in preference to her husband's brother or husband brother's son on the ground that a wife was a Sapinda of her husband and therefore on failure of the husband the co-widow was his nearest sapinda and entitled to the property in suit. <sup>(4)</sup> Referring to Brihaspati's text their Lordships said: "They are of opinion that the text of Brihaspati should be read distributively as regards the property of women married according to one of the approved forms and the property of those married in one of the lower forms. In the one case those of the heirs enumerated in Brihaspati who are blood relations of the husband, viz., the husband's sister's son, the husband's brother's son and the husband's brother will succeed to the women's property and in the other cases the relations of the father will succeed. In the diversity of opinion amongst the text writers whether Brihaspati's series of heirs take in the order in which they are enumerated their Lordships think that the better opinion is that the order of succession is not indicated." <sup>(5)</sup>

2682. According to this view, Kamalakara enumerates the following relations as ranking next to the husband:—

- (1) The step-son.
- (2) The step-grandson.
- (3) The rival wife.
- (4) The step-daughter.
- (5) The husband's other Gotraj sapindas, and

(6) Bandhus, in the order, in which they inherit his property. This view is indorsed by the Bombay Court <sup>(6)</sup> in a case in which the step-grandson was held entitled to a woman's stridhan in preference to a co-widow or to the husband's brother's son; and a co-widow was preferred to the grandchildren of the father-in-law's brother; because she was the nearest sapinda of the deceased husband <sup>(7)</sup> and the whole brother of the husband to his half brothers. <sup>(8)</sup> So in Madras the step-son is preferred to the sister's son <sup>(9)</sup> and following the same rule the grandson of a co-widow is preferred to a nephew and co-widow <sup>(10)</sup> and so the Privy Council preferred a co-widow to the husband's brother or the husband's brother's son <sup>(11)</sup> and the same high tribunal in another case confirmed rights of the collateral heirs of the husband <sup>(12)</sup> and the Allahabad Court maintained the rights of a collateral relation who was the near sapinda of the brother of the deceased husband in preference to the brother of the deceased <sup>(13)</sup> and in Madras the husband's brother's daughter's son is placed before the sister's daughter's son (1) Some modern text writers, however, favour the right of the deceased's step-daughter as against the collateral relations of the husband. (2)

Since the husband's Sapindas succeed to the Stridhan of his wife, there can be no distinction between his natural and adopted son as both are the sapindas of their father and would take equally. (3)

2583. The same principle governs the Mithila country where the text of

Mithila Law

Brihaspati has been declared in favour of the Mitakshara (4) according to which the husband's brothers's son (5) and the husband's sister's son are preferred to his paternal great-grandfather's great-grand son. (6)

The Mitakshara is silent on who are to take on a total failure of the husband's heirs. In Bombay it is suggested that in that case the father's sapindas next inherit. (7) This view is deduced from a text quoted in the Mitakshara that "on failure of relations on both sides (the husband's and the parent's) the King becomes the supporter and master of a female" and is endorsed by Sir Gurudas Bannerji who, however, adds "that it is not clear whether the paternal kinsmen should come after the husband's sapindas or after his Samnodaks." (8) of a woman married in the Asur form it has already been seen that the Mitakshara expressly mentions the mother, the father, the father's next of kin, and the mother's next of kin in the order of succession. (9) In this view after the parents the heirs to her stridhan would be, her sister's son, her husband's sister's son, her husband's brother's son, her brother's son, her son-in-law and her husband's younger brother in accordance with the following text :—

Cl. (2).

Brihaspati :—The mother's sister, the maternal uncle's wife, the paternal uncle's wife the father's sister, the mother-in law and the wife of an elder brother are pronounced similar to mothers. If they have no son born in lawful wedlock, nor daughter's son, nor his son, then the sister's son and the rest shall take their property. (1)

As already observed, the Privy Council have held that this text of Brihaspati, is illustrative and not exhaustive and that it should be read distributively as regards the property of women married according to one of the approved forms and the property of those married in a disapproved form; in the one case, those of the heirs enumerated in the text who are blood relations of the husband will succeed, and in the other case the relations of the father will succeed. (11) Under the Mayukh, however, the kinsmen enumerated by Brihaspati take in the order named by him. With this difference there is no other difference between <sup>(1)</sup> the Mitakshara and the Mayukh order of succession to the Stridhan of a woman married in either from. 2585. Analogous Law.—This and the next section state special rules governing the devolution of certain classes of technical stridhan. The rule here stated is with the variations noted in clauses (2) and (3) applicable alike to the Mitakshara <sup>(4)</sup> and the Mayukh. <sup>(5)</sup>

The texts on this point somewhat differ as will be apparent from the following :—

Gautam (one reading) The sister's fee belongs to the uterine brothers after the death of the mother. <sup>(6)</sup>

Ib. The sister's fee belongs to the uterine brothers. after them it goes to the mother, and next to the father. Some say before her <sup>(7)</sup>

Ib. The sister's fee belongs to her uterine brothers, if her mother be dead Some (declare, that it belongs to them) even while the mother lives <sup>(8)</sup>

2586. But the variation in the reading is immaterial since, the brother being mentioned first he was probably intended to take first, and this is the view now generally held. <sup>(9)</sup>

After the brother and the mother the course of devolution follows the other Stridhan.

(1) In the absence of legitimate issue, illegitimate issue inherit, daughters taking before sons ; otherwise succession follows the ordinary law or custom.

(2) Nothing in this section applies to a married woman.

2587. Mithila.—In the Mithila country after the brother and the mother, the father takes, which is also consistent with one reading of the text before cited and accepted by the Vivad Chintamani which is a local authority in the Mithila country.

2588. Dravid Departure.—In the Dravid country where the Smriti Chandrika is a special local authority the variation in reading before noticed is accepted so that the Sūlk is first inherited by the mother and then by the full brother.

283. In the Mayukh and the Dravid country the following classes of Stridhan follow a special line of devolution:—

(1) Yautak Stridhan goes to the maiden daughters in the first instance.

(2) Anvadheyak, Adhivednik and Pritti Datt stridhans are shared equally by (i) the sons and unmarried daughters, (ii) by the sons and married daughters and failing them, it is inherited by the daughter's children and son's son.

Provided that in the case of Stridhan mentioned in the last clause widowed daughters are excluded and the widows of Gotraj sapindas do not inherit any stridhan.

2589. Analogous Law.—The first clause stating that the Yautak Stridhan goes first to the unmarried daughters alone, not to the sons is in accordance with Manu (1) followed both in the Mitakshara (2) and the Mayukh. (3)

As to Anvadheyik Stridhan (4) Manu declares that it shall be inherited by her children (5) and it has been so held. (6) As amongst daughters the unmarried are preferred to the married. (7) The same rule extends to Southern India (8) except that widowed daughters are excluded from inheriting it (9) and the widows of Gotraj Sapindas do not take as they do under the Mayukh. (10) Consequently, neither the brother's widow (11) nor the daughter-in-law (12) will take as heir.

Pritti Dutt.—Is a species of Anvadheyak and follows the same rule. (13) and it then follows the line of succession applicable to other stridhan.

SPECIAL RULES OF DAYABHAG SUCCESSION.

2591. Analogous law :—The Dayabhag law on the subject of this section is supported by the following texts.

Devala. A woman's property is common to her sons and unmarried daughters, when she is dead; but if she have no issue, her husband shall take it, her mother, her brother or her father. (3)

Dayabhag. (Citing the last) Here it is expressly declared that the mother's goods are common to the son and unmarried daughter and if the maiden daughter were exclusively entitled to the whole of her mother's estate [notwithstanding the existence of the brother] the special text of Manu and others [which will be cited] concerning [yautak] wealth given at the nuptials, would be unmeaning; since she should have the right to all cases indiscriminately. (3)

(1) Dayabhag IV-III-25-28.

(2) Cited in Dayabhag IV-11-6

(3) Dayabhag IV-II-7.

2592. Son and betrothed daughter.—The next heir to the mother's Stridhan is her son and "unbetrothed" daughter. (1) The Sanskrit word for "betrothed" "Kumari" is so understood. The fact that the daughter is betrothed but not married is immaterial since both fall into a class apart. (2) But this view is combated by Jagannath who writes "Shri Krishna Taralankar, and others hold that unmarried daughter whether verbally betrothed or not, shall at the same time take equal shares. Does it not appear from the separate mention of them in the text of Gautam, that their title is successive? To this we reply, since it is acknowledged that the succession of a daughter who has been betrothed is barred by the claim of one who has not been affianced, both cannot have an equal right to inherit with their brother; one who has an equal title with the preferable heir, cannot be reduced to an equal succession with one who would have been excluded by that heir; for stronger and weaker claims cannot in the same circumstances, be equal. But as a son, who would be debarred by the existence of his own father, has an equal claim to the patrimony with his paternal uncle who had an equal right with his father, so likewise in the present instance a betrothed daughter who would have been debarred by a daughter not betrothed has an equal title with a son who had an equal title with a daughter who was not betrothed". (3)

2593. Married daughter having or who is likely to have an issue.—

CI. (2). The meaning of this phrase has already been examined in the preceding pages, while dealing with the general law of inheritance.

2594. Son's Son.—The son's son takes precedence of a daughter's son for it is reasonable, since the married daughter is debarred from the inheritance by the son, that the son of the debarred daughter shall be excluded by the son of the person who bars her claim. (4)

2595. Daughter's son.—The daughter's son takes next, for as the text of Manu expresses, "Even the son of a daughter delivers him in the next world, like the son of son" (5)

2596. Son's son's son.—The son's grandson is placed on the authority of Shri Krishna. (6)

2597. Son of a rival wife.—His claim was affirmed in an old case decided in 1836 (7) on the authority of the court Pandit who cited Dayakram Sangrah in support of his opinion. Gulab Shastri assigns him even a higher place between (3) and (4). (8)

2598. Grand and great grandson.—According to the Dayabhag, barren and widowed daughters should come in after the daughter's son, but both Shri Krishna (9) and Raghunandan support the order given here, and Shrikrishna's views are considered as preferable in this matter.

2600. Other heirs.—In default of her children, her step-sons or their male issue, the heirs to succeed are the heirs of a childless woman viz-her father, mother, brother and husband. (2). Cl. (10) (12) explained before, arises from the significance attached to the word "Aprat" and "apratisthit" which are interpreted to mean "unaffianced" and "not actually married." (1)

A widowed daughter having a son himself disqualified to inherit, will still count as a married daughter having a son. (2)

289. Persons disqualified from ordinary inheritance by reason of physical defects mentioned in S. 236 are equally incompetent to inherit to stridhan.

2603. Analogous Law.—The following texts support this section.

Manu:—Impotent persons and outcasts are excluded from a share of the heritage; and so are persons born blind and deaf as well as madmen, idiots, the dumb and those who have lost a sense (or limb). (3)

Mitakehara:—(Citing the last) The masculine gender is not here used restrictively in speaking of an outcaste and the rest. It must be therefore, understood that the wife, the daughter, the mother or any other female being disqualified for any of the defects which have been specified is likewise excluded from participation. (4)

2604. This passage however refers to succession to a male. And the question arises whether it is equally a disqualification to succession to Stridhan. On this point it was observed in a case "According to the Hindu lawyers, such and other infirmities are the signs of original sin, and it is the sin which is the cause of disinheritance and this is used as a ground for bringing men to repentance. The Stridhan, heir, would not be affected by this, and the widow, though dumb, may recover this portion of the property; the daughter cannot." (5)

290. (1) In the absence of legitimate issue, illegitimate issue inherit, daughters taking before sons.
Illegitimacy no bar, (2) Nothing in this section applies to a married woman.

 (2) Prostitute's children (2606).

2605. Analogous Law.—Abundant texts (6) exist in the early Smritis recognizing one's natural offspring and there is no authority against the existence of heritable blood between the woman and her offspring. As such Hindu law recognizes children whether legitimate or illegitimate as entitled to inherit to their mother (7) in the absence of legitimate issue. (8) But the rule is obviously inapplicable to the illegitimate issue of a married woman.

2606. Prostitute's Children.—The rule is more applicable to professional prostitutes and to women who have become degraded by unchastity. In the case of the former attached as devadasis to pagodas, the courts both in Bombay <sup>(1)</sup> and in Madras <sup>(2)</sup> have recognized the right of their illegitimate issue to inherit, daughters taking before sons. This is so by custom, if not by law. <sup>(3)</sup> But it is said that the pagoda girls should not be taken to determine the general law of their class, since they take by custom more than by law. <sup>(4)</sup>

2607. The question is however one upon which one cannot feel certain since there are two views possible and both views are supported by a strong body of judicial opinions, since while on the one hand it is held that "with prostitutes the tie of kindred being broken, none of their relations who remain undegraded in caste, whether offspring or not inherit from them. Their issue after their degradation succeed." <sup>(5)</sup> On the other hand it has been held that "no tie of blood can be destroyed by unchastity, whatever personal disability may be imposed by express provisions of the law upon the person who has become unchaste; consequently, while inheritance is a right arising out of consanguinity, the unchastity or degradation of the propositus or proposita as the case may be, will not divert the descent of property, save where there is an express provision." <sup>(6)</sup> This view seems unquestionably right; for there is no authority for the proposition that when a woman has lapsed into prostitution, she becomes civilly dead, with the result that the tie of relationship which connects her to her kindred is completely severed. It has accordingly been held that the Stridhan of a degraded married woman would follow the natural line of succession applicable to her Stridhan. <sup>(7)</sup> As such the Courts have upheld the claims of the husband <sup>(8)</sup> stepson <sup>(9)</sup> brother's son <sup>(10)</sup> and the daughter. <sup>(11)</sup>

ADDENDA.

[Bringing citations to August 1919.]

A widow's right to adopt does not depend upon her inheriting any property from her husband, and she may make an adoption though no property vests in her. Pratap Singh v. Agar Singh, 36 M. L. J. 511; 17 A. L. J. 522; 50 I. C. 457 P. C.

An endowment for the worship of God without specifying the deity is void. Chande v. Hartibola, 29 C. L. J. 366.

Though there may be necessity for incurring a debt it does not follow that such necessity would support a loan the terms of which are onerous which must be otherwise proved. Nazir Begam v. Raghunath Singh, 23 C. W. N. 700 P. C.

Adoption by a widow aged 15 upheld on the ground that she had obtained sufficient maturity of understanding to comprehend the nature of the act. Basappa v. Shudramappa, 21 Bom. L. R. 217; 50 I. C. 786.

Of two co-widows in Bombay, the senior may adopt without any express authority of her husband, but the junior cannot adopt without the consent of the senior co-widow or the special authority of her husband Id.

It is on the creditor seeking to recover his debt from the joint family to prove that it was contracted by the manager for a purpose binding on the family. Gurusami v. Gopalaswami, 36 M. L. J. 588; 50 I. C. 775.

A Jagir must be taken prima facie to be an estate only for life. The words "putra-poutradi" in the grant of Jagir, do not, at all events outside Bengal, necessarily import an estate of inheritance descending to collaterals. Ram Narayan v. Ram Saran, 36 M. L. J. 344 P. C. reversing O. A. 42 C. 405.

A married female may act as archak of a temple. Annaya v. Ammakka, 35 M. L. J. 196 (209) F. B.

In order to raise any presumption at all the consent must be the consent of the next reversioner. The joining in of a contingent reversioner raises no presumption of necessity. Gur Narayan v. Sheolal, 46 C. 566 P. C.

A benami transaction is not necessarily illegal or void. A benamidar may maintain a suit upon his benami title though the beneficiary may claim to be added as a party. There can be no estoppel against the beneficiary unless the alienee's position is worsened by it. Gur Narayan v. Sheolal, 46 C. 566 P. C.
